“Mareiko, what are you...” he began, but the words trailed off again as, with a sweep of her left arm, Mareiko raised her sword, pushing the tip towards his jugular until it scraped lightly against the surface of his skin. He cursed, stepping back, but Mareiko did not halt her advance, her steps unhurried and even, but determined. Thrown completely by this unexpected and uncharacteristic hostility, Atsushi could do nothing but back away, but the hard surface of his office wall soon told him there was nowhere else to run. Mareiko’s eyes became slits, and for a moment, Atsushi thought he saw a flicker of fire lurking in their depths.

Then, in tones laced with suppressed anger and hate, she spoke once more.

“It’s been twenty-five years, hasn’t it?” she whispered, and Atsushi felt the prick of the blade press more resolutely against his skin. “Twenty-five years ago, you killed my Captain in the Rukon. You probably thought you got away with it, but now, at long last, I’m here to avenge his death.”

63. Rage, Greed, Insanity

Chapter Sixty Two: Rage, Greed, Insanity

The campsite was in ruins.

Kyouki drew a deep breath into her lungs, brushing back the loose strands of wavy dark hair from her face with her free left hand and scanning the surroundings for any sign of her target. Scorch-marks peppered the entire environment, the combination of her maternal anger and the white hot flares of heat from Gekkoushin's Day Moon blade rendering most of the area into charcoal rubble, yet somehow the lumbering beast had managed to avoid her attacks. He had been remarkably agile for one Kyouki considered without rationality, and she had quickly realised that, repulsive as his actions may have been, it did not mean that she was dealing with a normal Hollowed spirit. On the contrary, there had been glimmers of light and understanding in the creature's feral eyes, and though he had not attempted to speak to her, Kyouki felt sure that it was not necessarily because he had no way to communicate.

She took a cautious step or two forwards, glancing around the heaps of rocks and tree debris for any sign of where her foe had gone. The dark, thickly packed forestland lay before her, and she gazed at it, knowing that it was the perfect hiding place for an ambush. She could still sense him, his presence all around her, but though her military training told her that he was most likely somewhere within the woods, she was reluctant to follow him in. It was a battleground he had chosen, she reflected, not one that suited her and her sword all that well, and, whilst putting an end to the danger was her first priority, she knew from long experience that vandalising large swathes of real world woodland with an unexpected forest fire was something to be avoided if at all possible.

Her gaze flitted to the left, the spatters of blood that lined the area a visual clue to the direction in which her division had retreated. Arai had held his nerve on receiving Kyouki's instructions, and had managed to organise the shell-shocked members of the Fifth Division with remarkable speed, getting all those who were physically able to help those who were not. Nobody had been left behind, though Kyouki felt certain that some of her men would not have survived the monster's original attack, and the dented, bloodsoaked crest that had once adorned her eldest son's arm was a constant reminder of the fact that Ryuusei may be among those beyond saving. She could not give up on tracking the creature, not even to attend to her son, for her foe had proven already that he was capable of ripping lesser division members to shreds. What her opponent's true spiritual level was, she was not yet sure, for he had made no attempt to attack her directly, merely leaping and dodging her blasts with uncanny accuracy and mocking, inarticulate screeches.

He was playing with her.

The knowledge made her even more angry, but there was little she could do about it except find her target and make him regret ever crossing her path.

A rustle of tree branches alerted her to the fact that he had tired of waiting, and she swung around, Gekkoushin raised and glittering with energy as a blast of eerie green light came surging out from the darkness of the woodland, followed by the ungainly form of her enemy, leaping down from the trees and landing with an ugly kind of deftness on all fours. Kyouki swung her sword, casting another scorching flare of Day Moon fire across the battered campsite to meet the Cero head on, and, as the two blasts of spirit power collided, they exploded into a dazzling ball of light, illuminating the copse so brightly that for a moment neither Kyouki nor her opponent could see a thing. Blinded, Kyouki allowed her instincts to take over, tilting her weapon so that the smooth, golden surface of Gekkoushin's blade reflected the intensity of the glare.

"Hitsuki no Kagayaki," she murmured, and with a neat sweep of her weapon, she brought the dazzling glow under her own control, driving the sword down so that the haze cloaked her from view. Little by little she began to make out shapes and colours, faint and indistinct yet enough for her to use as landmarks and, as her opponent hesitated, still confused by the force of the glare, Kyouki slipped into shunpo, re-materialising directly behind the creature's body. Without a moment of hesitation, she drew Gekkoushin's gleaming blade in a smooth, arced stroke. From the scalding hot surface of the blade burst a fresh flame of energy, searing through the thin Real World atmosphere towards her target. Too late, the Hollow man registered that he was in danger, and with a shriek he attempted to dodge out of the way, but it was in vain. The speed of Kyouki's Day Moon attack was faster than he could clear its trajectory, and the flame engulfed his left side, causing an ungodly shriek of pain to fill the entire surrounding area.

Kyouki carved through the dazzling light of Gekkoushin's shield, dispersing the haze to see how much damage had been done. The creature was on the ground, his left arm little more than a charred mess from shoulder to finger-tip. The heat had reduced flesh and bone to cinders, but his attempts to evade it had, at least, prevented the blast from causing fatal damage and, though the edge of his mask was singed and cracked away, the majority of it remained intact. Kyouki lifted her weapon again, preparing to put an end to the matter once and for all, but, as she prepared to cast Gekkoushin down one final time, the creature raised his gaze, his feral gaze boring into hers. His lips parted, and Kyouki was aware of a thick tongue lolling around inside of his mouth. He did not speak, and the next moment he was gone, with a flash of reiryoku so like shunpo it took the other woman off guard. She cursed, swinging around for any sign of him, but she could not see him.

Even with an injury that bad, he manages to move so swiftly? That was shunpo... or something very close to it. I don't remember ever hearing that Hollows could do shunpo — not enough rational thought or control to learn any kind of meaningful technique other than Cero. This one has both Cero and the ability to move, though. I'm not sure how... but if he's still able to do that, then the injury I gave him can't be as bad as I thought.

A commotion from the woodland drew her attention, as a flock of birds erupted suddenly from the upper branches of the trees, squawking and screeching as though running for their lives. No sooner had they made their evacuation when Kyouki heard animals squealing, and her blood ran cold. Remembering the rabbit in the snare, she suddenly understood the reason behind the animals' fear, and more, what and who it was who had been hunting them.

Not Real World people at all. The one who set the snare was this one. This creature who I assumed was out of his wits is really the hunter that's terrorised the forestland. He ate Ryuusei's arm, I saw him. The rabbit was also his handiwork. And now... what is he doing? Why is he attacking forest critters instead of attacking me?

Her eyes became near slits as she contemplated.

I can't assume that he's lacking in understanding or rationality, even if his actions are abhorrent and seem inexplicable to me. On his own level, he is thinking, reacting, strategising, and for that reason, Gekkoushin has not yet been able to take him down. That leaves one horrendous possibility I haven't yet explored.

She took a tentative step towards the forest, knowing now that, disadvantage or not, she could not avoid going in to locate her prey.

Shinigami eat to replenish reiatsu reserves when they are injured. They use food as a medium through which power can be regenerated. Hollows eat souls to keep themselves satiated. This creature is a hybrid of both elements — a soul, but not a Pure Soul, and a Hollow, but not a full Hollow. He ate Ryuusei's arm, and he was very swift at avoiding my attacks. Now he's hurt, and retreated to the forest... but what if it isn't a retreat? What if the birds fled because they know that if they don't, he will kill them? Real World animals are much smarter than Real World people when it comes to sensing danger. They can see him, as sure as they can see me... and more, the rabbit proves he's able to touch and consume them. We eat food, and this creature hunts animals. His savagery has a purpose. He's using them to heal. The question is, if I go in there after him, can I track him down and put an end to this without putting myself in serious danger? This is his territory and he probably knows it like the back of his hand. I'm a stranger here... and that might prove crucial.

She sighed, glancing at her weapon.

I also can't set fire to the forest, which will probably mean a change of tactics at some point in this encounter.

Not without misgivings, she allowed the golden gleam of Gekkoushin's blade to dim to a dull amber, drawing in her reiryoku as far as she dared so as not to accidentally cause an inferno the moment she stepped into the wood. She ducked beneath the branches of the outermost trees, pushing back the stray leaves and foliage as she tried once more to get her spiritual bearings in the dim, gloomy woodland. There was silence now, no birds, no animals, not even the buzz of insects, as though everything that lived in the forest had gone to ground, attempting to make themselves as inconspicuous as possible. The creature's reiatsu was heavy all around her, but he made no attempt to attack, and Kyouki continued deeper into the woodland, certain that she was being led into a hunter's trap but knowing that she had no choice but to spring it if she was going to have a chance of killing her opponent. Time was ticking by, with who knew how many members of her division wounded or killed, and every moment she wasted was a moment longer that they were not receiving help. This thought spurred her on, but though an occasional gentle breeze rustled through the branches, there was no sign of her foe.

If I was in any doubt before that this was something to do with Keitarou, this kind of cat and mouse game would confirm it for me.

Kyouki gritted her teeth, stepping over the tree roots and past the remains of the dead rabbit without giving it a single glance. As she stepped into a small clearing, she had the impression that someone — or something — was watching her, and she raised her gaze to the tree canopy, squinting as she tried to make out anything that ought not be there.

At first she could see nothing, but then something soft and bloody dropped to the ground in front of her, and she sprang back, sword poised in case it was some kind of an attack. As she brought it into clearer focus, however, she could see that it was the tail of something small and furry, probably a squirrel, and that, from the blood, it had only recently been parted from its owner. Kyouki prodded it cautiously with the tip of Gekkoushin's blade, before glancing up in the direction from which it had come. At first she could not see him, but then, as the branches above her rustled, she made out the beady gaze through the leaves, staring down at her like a hunter preparing to pounce on his prey. The intensity of the stare sent chills through Kyouki's body as she added another realisation to her understanding of her foe.

He hadn't just brought her here to fight her. He had brought her here in anticipation of the kill. This was not a fight for anyone or any cause in particular, but simply a lust to hunt and destroy, and probably, Kyouki reflected grimly, in order for him to feed on her next. The squirrel tail had not been dropped by accident, but as a deliberate hint to his presence. He had decided it was time to re-begin the contest, and Kyouki understood that from the very start they had been fighting on his terms, not her own.

She did not have time to process her companion's motives any further, for at that moment, the Hollow man let out a tremendous yell which could only be interpreted as a war cry, launching himself without a hint of fear towards his companion. Kyouki cursed, bringing Gekkoushin up to stop him, but he seemed to sense that she was somehow limited in using the powerful attacks that she had flung around with reckless abandon beyond the forest limits, and the Fifth Division Captain wondered whether this had been another reason for his luring her into the wood. As he plunged towards her, he extended his left hand as though to grab her throat and Kyouki was horrified to see that, though his clothing remained charred and wrecked from Gekkoushin's blast, the limb she had turned almost to charcoal was now once more healed and alive, its fingers twitching in anticipation of the kill. She slipped into shunpo, re-materialising a small distance across the clearing, but her companion did not crash into the ground, using the momentum of his leap instead to swing his body around and land with perfect accuracy on all fours at the foot of the tree. He turned his head, glaring at her through the tiny sockets in the chalky mask as though chastising her for ruining his fun, and Kyouki tightened her grip on Gekkoushin's blade, trying to work out what he intended to do next.

For a moment there was deadlock, as the two eyed each other. The Hollow-man had not tried to get to his feet, instead padding around the edge of the copse towards her in a slow, methodical fashion rather like that of a tiger, stalking its prey. The hunch Kyouki had noticed in the man's spine now no longer seemed like a hunch, but a biological adaptation of his body which allowed him to move more easily on all fours, instead of upright on two legs, and long, straggly fair hair flowed like a mane over his shoulders, only adding to the impression that she was faced with a wild hunting cat and not a humanoid at all. She backed away from him cautiously, loath to re-enter the woodland but knowing that she was essentially trapped here with him, and she needed a good strategy with which to fight.

Whatever it was, it would have to be quick, as she now knew that a maiming injury was all but ineffective against him. Yet getting close to a creature willing to consume live animals and body parts in order to rebuild his body was a risky endeavour, and the speed of his movement made it unlikely that she could kill him with a single, potent blast of Gekkoushin's fire.

She gazed at her blade, debating. In this confined environment, using her Bankai was less than ideal, but there was still one potential line of attack that she had not yet tried.

She raised the weapon, turning her attention back to her opponent, but he was nowhere to be seen. Her heart stopped in her chest as she realised that, in the split second her attention had been drawn away from him, he had once more used the strange, shunpo-like power and given himself back the element of surprise. He had not gone far, for his intoxicating reiatsu was still all around her, and Kyouki swung around, moving into the centre of the copse and gazing around her in genuine alarm. Though a powerful fighter, she had never been good against opponents whose key skills lay in stealth techniques, and she began to wish that she had brought Midori with her, feeling certain that the young Shihouin would have been able to anticipate the creature's movements with far more ease.

There was no time to think or regret any more, however, for something came barrelling out of the dark woodland at that moment, claw-like fingers outstretched. This time his hands made contact with Kyouki's body, grabbing hold of her haori and yanking at it as he tried to reach the warm flesh that lay beneath. Now genuinely frightened, Kyouki struggled to pull away, but the monster's face was almost level with hers, his fetid breath choking her and making her gag and his gleaming eyes boring into hers. He was preparing for the kill, she knew, for even without language, she could pick up the shifts in his aura and sense the excitement and anticipation that lay there. He had no understanding of her as a shinigami, a Captain, an enemy. He did not know her as Shiba Kyouki, Head of the Shiba Clan and a formidable warrior heroine among her Clan and across her District. None of those things mattered or even registered to this individual. He saw her simply as another living thing that he could consume to feed his insatiable appetite, and for a moment Kyouki froze, uncertain of what she could do.

Kyouki!

Gekkoushin's strident tones penetrated the haze of fear, and with a jolt, Kyouki realised where she was and what was happening. A split-second of time had passed, but, as the enemy's blood-stained fingers reached out to grab her throat, she swung against him, using her sword's sheer blade to cut through the fabric of her haori and cast it away. The Hollow-man fell back with a yowl and a thud as the scorched white cloth fell into two, and Kyouki gathered her composure, passing Gekkoushin between her right and left hands as she tried to calm her nerves.

We're not done here yet. Doubtless I'll get another scolding for sacrificing a haori on the battlefield, but at least cloth can be replaced more easily than my life. Thank you, Gekkoushin. For a moment there, I wasn't sure what to do.

Don't even think about giving up again, not when I'm clasped in your hand. You know we can do better than that.

Gekkoushin's voice was unmoved.

Now stop dithering and get on with it. Or don't you care that your son may be bleeding to death because of this creature?

Kyouki's eyes narrowed, and she nodded, feeling her resolve harden once more as the Hollow-man scrambled to his hands and feet, discarding the piece of fabric and using his back legs to launch another attack on the Gotei Captain.

This time Kyouki was not to be thrown, however, and she summoned her reiryoku, watching as the amber colour of Gekkoushin's blade shifted to a cold, arctic blue.

"We can't use fire, so it's time for the opposite," she murmured. "Hi ga shizundemo, sora ni hikatte. Yozuki."

The gloomy stretch of marshland exploded into another blast of crimson light, sending clumps of muck and slime flying in all directions. Muttering curses under his breath, Ryuu ducked and rolled out of the way of the blast, and a barrage of silver petals shot across the air from the other side of the swamp, on a collision course with Haruya's thick white mask. The Hollow-man had anticipated

Shirogane's attack, however, raising a thick fist to bat back the bulk of the petals, and Ryuu saw the glitter of argent light that surrounded them intensify, pulling the fragments back together before any could become lost in the mud a second time.

He gazed down at the weapon in his hands, noting with a critical gaze that his own plunge to the ground had splattered the dark muck across Shizurugi's own fine, floral hilt. His sword would likely scold him for it later, he reflected, but in the midst of battle, there was no time for such frivolities, and so he pulled himself to his feet, ignoring the slurping, squelching sound of his uniform pulling through the slick ground.

Since his arrival on the scene, the pace of the encounter had changed, but it had quickly become clear to Ryuu's analytical brain that his Vice Captain was hugely disadvantaged. Whilst Ginkyoujiki was able to damage Haruya's mask, their broad-set opponent was both agile and intelligent to the danger, protecting his face from every one of Shirogane's speculative attacks. Ryuu's own sword had made contact with Haruya's skin on a couple of occasions, but, whilst it had seared through the flesh, leaving a long, dark scar, it had not done anything to slow down the enemy's attack. Indeed, after the initial shock of Shizurugi's purified spirit power against his own tainted reiatsu, Haruya had shown not a single pain reaction, his eyes derisive and daring them to do better.

"What's this? I thought that Kuchiki were supposed to be finely groomed and proud people," he mocked now. "Are you sure your Captain will recognise your corpses, if you continue to roll in the mud? Or are you thinking that I might lose sight of you if you camouflage yourself with the local surrounds?"

His eyes darted in Shirogane's direction, as though sensing the surge of energy surrounding the other man's sword.

"I wouldn't bother, unless you want that pretty little toy of yours buried beneath the grime a second time," he said disparagingly. "Your sword can't hurt me, Kuchiki Shirogane, so you might as well surrender and die."

"Mine can, though," Ryuu answered before Shirogane could retort, bringing Shizurugi's blade down in a sweeping arc towards Haruya's hands, where a glimmer of a Cero had begun to take shape. Shizurugi's pure aura sliced through the heart of the blast, fragmenting it into its component atoms, and Haruya pulled his hands back, casting Ryuu a look of dislike.

“You can tattoo me. I wouldn’t call it hurting,” he said dismissively. “It took me off guard, before, but for all your fine words, so far all you’ve managed to do is brand a few scars into my body. Well, I had plenty of those before, inside and out. I’m not a vain man, so I don’t mind taking a few more. Fire away, Kuchiki Ryuu. Your sword doesn’t scare me, either.”

He folded his arms across his chest, glancing from one shinigami to the other.

“Well?” he challenged. “Are you already out of ideas? I’m not even out of breath. I put my mask on, but perhaps that was premature. I don’t seem to need the level of power that Keitarou thought I would... and against Kuchiki, too. Pitiful.”

“Keitarou!” Shirogane’s eyes flashed with fire, his grip on his sword tightening, and Haruya laughed, nodding his head.

“I thought that might rile you,” he said lightly. “You seem fixated with him. What he’s done to you, I neither know nor care, but if it inspires you to fight me, all to the good. I told you, didn’t I? I’ve a lot of anger to expend and you’re not helping me expend it. It’s the first time in a long time I’ve been able to move so freely and I feel as though I’ve barely begun... but if this is all Sixth District can send me, I’m going to go home disappointed.”

“What is Keitarou to you?” Shirogane demanded, and Ryuu frowned, slipping into shunpo and re-materialising at his Vice Captain’s side.

“Don’t let him lead you, Fukutaichou,” he murmured. “He’s trying to taunt us into anger and therefore error. He is within his wits... he is not a mindless monster and we cannot think to tackle him with the usual level of spiritual force.”

“It doesn’t matter,” Shirogane shook his head impatiently. “Monster or not, he’s injured our men and he’s connected to Keitarou. We won’t find what we’re looking for without dealing with what’s right in front of us. If you’re suggesting we retreat, Ryuu, put the thought out of your head. We don’t have that option.”

“I wasn’t thinking anything of the kind,” Ryuu was mildly affronted by the suggestion. “We must defeat him, but I think... we need to re-strategise. This way...” he tapped the blade of his sword against Ginkyoujiki’s guard, “is getting us nowhere at all, and there are young ones with injuries that ought to be properly treated. I know you are thinking of Ribari-sama... but we are not fighting here for vengeance. We are fighting because it is our duty, and that is all.”

Shirogane shot Ryuu a startled look, and the Third Seat offered him a rueful smile.

"I am not normally impulsive," he said pragmatically. "There are times when that is a disadvantage, but I believe in a fight such as this, it is well to remain level-headed. Haruya, or whatever you called yourself," he turned to the Hollow-man, raising his voice. "You are mistaken if you think that Kuchiki officers can be goaded into playing by your rules. We are here to fight and kill you if that is what it takes to pass you and locate our target. We are not interested in conversation with you unless you seek to tell us the whereabouts of that target."

Haruya snorted, opening his lips to retort, but before he could speak, his entire body froze, tension rippling suddenly through his broad frame. Ryuu stared at him, confused by the flicker of fear that darted through the reptilian gaze, followed by a sudden fluctuation in the man's whole aura. For an instant, Haruya's eyes were no longer those of the Hollow, but of a man, stricken with grief and dismay, but before either Ryuu or Shirogane had time to process this unexpected shift, Haruya's entire body became bathed in an angry reddish light, his fists punching up towards the sky. He opened his mouth, letting out a loud, blood-curdling roar which seemed to shake through the whole surroundings. The chips and cracks which Shirogane's sword had managed to carve through the edge of his mask began to glitter and, bit by bit, draw together, sealing and mending until the smooth white surface was once more intact. No, it was more than that, Ryuu realised with a jolt of dismay, for the chalky substance no longer stopped at his chin but appeared to be encircling his entire head, slipping over and around his ears and sliding down over the thick red-gold waves of hair like a helmet. Two sharp, horns protruded from the crown of this helmet, and Haruya let out a second, then a third roar of rage. He opened his fists, sparks of red energy bursting forth from them like restless fireworks, and as fragments of energy caught the edge of the rotting buildings, the damp wood began to smoulder, producing clouds of acrid dark smoke.

"What the hell..." Shirogane murmured, more than half to himself, and Ryuu bit his lip, as confused by the sudden transformation as his companion. Before he could respond, however, the world seemed to become a grainy mix of black and white, images jerking and jumping as though his consciousness was having trouble keeping up with whatever was going on around him, and he stumbled, his grip on Shizurugi's hilt loosening. Desperately he grabbed for his blade, only just managing to prevent it falling into the mud. At his side, Shirogane's hand had also gone to his head, and Ryuu suddenly realised what was happening. Without warning, he grasped Shirogane by the arm, pulling them both into a desperate shunpo into the abandoned village.

“What are you doing!” As they dropped out of the flashstep, Shirogane pulled his hand free, glaring at his companion angrily, but Ryuu paid him no attention, ducking behind the uneven frame of an old market stall to where the members of Sixth Division were still huddled, frightened and confused.

“Go to the river!” he instructed, his words uncharacteristically urgent and direct. He thrust Shizurugi’s point out in the right direction. “Go, go now! Go and don’t look back -that’s an order!”

“Ryuu!” Shirogane pushed through behind him, but Ryuu took no notice.

“Go to the river!” He bellowed, and the shock of being yelled at in such a way by such a reasoned, methodical officer seemed to galvanise the lesser ranks into action. Gathering up the wounded bodies of the two young men, they hurried to obey the command. Sakurai, after meeting Ryuu’s gaze, took immediate control of the situation, hurrying and chivvying individuals to their feet, and before long, the entire space had been vacated.

“What the hell are you doing?” Shirogane grabbed his cousin by the fabric of his hakamashita. “Why are you giving orders over my head, to my men? Have you forgotten what your rank is, and who your Vice Captain happens to be? This is my command, not yours — why are you overreaching my position and acting on your own impulses? More, why are we here, not out there? The enemy is there, and we’re not retreating, remember? Why are we half-way inside of the village, instead of doing our job?”

“I’ve felt it before,” Ryuu inclined his head apologetically towards his companion in acknowledgement of his superior’s indignation. “My apologies, senpai. I’ll accept your discipline later — but I wanted to ensure that as many people as possible lived till later, and...”

“And?” Shirogane’s eyes narrowed. “What do you mean, you’ve felt it before?”

Ryuu’s lips pressed together, and he sighed, beckoning for his companion to follow him, cautiously, around the old and dilapidated buildings, towards the epicentre of reiryoku that was still erupting in the marshland beyond.

“When Father was ill, I felt it,” he said softly. “When Father was angry, this is how it felt. This penetrating, poisoning sensation.”

“Seiren-dono?” Shirogane was taken aback, and Ryuu nodded, drawing forth an image of his father’s Hollowfication in his mind’s eye.

“When Father was angry, it was truly terrifying,” he murmured. “I remember most of the encounter, and I know that he acted to protect me, not to hurt me. But there are a few moments that, try as I might, I cannot bring to mind. Moments in which Father laid hands on me and pulled me forcibly from Keitarou’s grasp. I know he saved me, but my memories were jumbled by his reiryoku and even now, I cannot put them back together. Father was not my enemy, but in that instant, he could’ve killed me.”

He raised Shizurugi, pointing in Haruya’s direction.

“That is not Father. That is an enemy, and he is there to kill us,” he said grimly. “More, he is stronger than we are, and this reaction concerns me. I do not know what sparked it, but I realise that things have changed. He was rational and clear, mocking us... he said he was full of rage, but there was no real anger in what he did. This, however... is anger. Anger strong enough to put us out cold. Maybe even strong enough to...”

“To kill the juniors outright,” now Shirogane understood. “Fine. You could’ve done it a bit more clearly, but I get it now. I rescind the threat of discipline in light of your greater experience — though I have to tell you, Ryuu, if Seiren-dono ever looked or acted even a bit like that thing out there, I am quite glad I never happened to see it.”

“It is a terrible affliction,” Ryuu agreed soberly. “It has impacted on Father’s health and his life in many ways... he is not the man he once was, but his spirit power was within him from birth. This creature we are fighting has knowledge of Keitarou, therefore I can only assume that he has become mutated by Keitarou’s science in some way. What his limits are, or how much control he has, I do not know. All I know is that he intends to kill us. More, his sudden explosion of anger and energy just now indicates that, perhaps, his sanity is not what it appeared to be. Rationality in Hollows is something I find hard to credit... and if he is losing control of his, we have a far worse fight on our hands than we did before.”

“Agreed,” Shirogane muttered grimly, glancing at Ginkyoujiki, then giving it a little shake to seal it, returning it to its place at his side. “I can’t use my sword, either — he’s right about that. I’ll have to rely on my speed and my kidou, rather than my blade, and trust you to back me up with Shizurugi as you can.”

“Do you think we can fight and defeat him that way, when we failed to damage him when he was rational?” Ryuu peered out from behind the slat of mouldy wood, eying the hunched figure of their foe with a critical eye. The explosive flares of red reiatsu had abated, and the air was no longer so filled with toxic spirit power, but there was a glint of something darker and more predatorial in the man’s gleaming gaze, and every muscle of his body seemed to be rippling in anticipation of the kill.

“He looks as though he’d like to tear us limb from limb, and is probably capable,” Ryuu said at length. “Father is far more slightly built than this one, yet I believed him capable of tearing Keitarou’s head from his body if he had so wished.”

“Would that he had, and then we’d all have been back home, where it was dry,” Shirogane muttered. “Do you think this one can sense us?”

“Probably,” Ryuu agreed. “Father was calmer when nobody was attacking him, but when someone did...” he shook his head. “Just because he seems to have settled, I imagine that, as soon as he sets eyes on us, he will react once more.”

“Well, charming,” Shirogane grimaced. “It’s bad enough we have to fight in this place, and that we have to fight a half Hollow, half man experiment of that damned scientist, without having to fight against one who’s lost all vestiges of sanity he ever had. I swear, Ryuu, I will treat Seiren-dono with a new level of respect after this encounter — for him to have gone to such extremes of madness and yet recover his wits well enough to support Guren-sama at court is quite a feat of recovery, and I ought to credit it more.”

“Indeed,” Ryuu agreed grimly. “Still, we cannot stay here the whole day. The men are gone. It’s only us, and between us, we stand as good a chance as any other Vice Captain and Third Seat — perhaps better, if I may say so, than most. We are a good team, Fukutaichou. Even if the odds are against us, we must use what we have and try.”

“If I had to chose anyone to wade through swamp mud with, in order to take down a raving, lunatic Hollow-man, you’d be top of my list,” Shirogane smiled ironically.

“Come out of hiding, you cowards!” Before Ryuu could respond to this back-handed bit of praise, Haruya let out a yell, every note trembling with ill-suppressed fury. “Where are you, you no-good shinigami? I’ll make you pay! I’ll rip every single one of your limbs from your body and make you suffer for this!”

“What is the mad loon talking about now?” Shirogane arched an eyebrow, and Ryuu shrugged, mystified.

“If you don’t come out, I’ll come in after you!” A flare of red energy barrelled into the village, blowing apart a nearby storehouse, and Haruya took a lurching step or two forward, his aura prickling ominously and his gaze roving the surrounding area for any sign of life. “I know you’re there, you pathetic soul-slayers! I’ll dig you out and pull you to pieces, bit by bit! I’ll show you, every one of you! You won’t get away with hurting Aki... do you hear me? You won’t leave here alive, any of you, so don’t think you can hide from me!”

“What’s an ‘Aki’?” Ryuu blinked, and Shirogane snorted.

“Better not to ask. Better just to kill him,” he said matter-of-factly, resting his hands on the remains of the building wall and leaping nimbly over it, slipping into shunpo and re-materialising some feet from Haruya’s line of fire. The Hollow-man lumbered around to face him, but Shirogane’s fingers were already pulling together in one, two, three flares of Shakkahou, firing before disappearing and re-appearing in a different position in an attempt to confuse the enemy’s judgement. Haruya let out a roar, fresh Cero glittering from his fingers, and Ryuu could tell even from this distance that it was more potent and intense a flare than any of those the man had fired before. Those had been teasing, taunting jibes, but this one held a genuine intent to kill, and he thrust Shizurugi forth, releasing the bolt of pure purple energy. It sliced through the heart of the Cero, splitting it in two and causing it to disintegrate, but just as quickly, Haruya had produced another one, firing it towards Ryuu and causing him to shunpo out of its trajectory.

Whatever an ‘Aki’ was, and whatever Haruya’s demeanour had changed, the real battle was going to begin from this point on. And, no matter how much bravado either he or Shirogane used, Ryuu’s clinical common sense told him that their chances of emerging triumphant were severely limited.

Guren-sama could not fight Father. He struggled to match him, and almost lost his life.

He chewed hard on his lip, even as he flicked his sword once more in Haruya’s direction, attempting to penetrate the man’s defences and pierce through the masked skull.

This one is not as strong as Father was. Maybe because it is not a natural mutation, or the original spirit power was lacking. However I try to define it, though... one thing is crystal clear. It might not be as powerful as

Father was when he was ill... but it is more powerful than we are. Even if we work together... even if we're good at that... Ginkyoujiki is useless against it and that is a problem. We came here to find Keitarou, but it seems Keitarou was anticipating us, and has countered accordingly.

Haruya's rationality might have become questionable, but his speed and his reflexes had increased since the sudden flare of power. As Shirogane increased his barrage of kidou, the monster suddenly disappeared, reappearing a split-second before the Vice Captain dropped out of his final flashstep. With a roar, he grabbed the startled Shirogane by the fabric of his shihakushou, tossing him bodily in the direction of the nearest standing wooden wall. Before Ryuu could react, Shirogane had gathered his wits, righting himself and disappearing back into shunpo before re-materialising some distance away, but he had clearly had his senses shaken by the encounter, and Ryuu knew that he felt the same way.

That isn't shunpo, but it's just as fast. Father did it too, and anticipating it was impossible. Haruya anticipated Senpai's steps, though, which suggests, angry as he is now, he is still operating with some rationality and is able to judge our movements as he did before. He's become more dangerous... but it hasn't created a weakness in his attack. On the contrary, we are in considerably more danger now than we were a few moments ago.

A fresh Cero came blasting out of nowhere in his direction, and Ryuu cursed, swinging Shizurugi up to cut physically through the blast. It disintegrated, but a judder of pain rippled through the sword's aura, telling Ryuu that his zanpakutou was being pushed to its limits, and that further direct contact with Haruya's compressed reiryoku might do it serious damage.

The handicaps are building up, and we don't have a battle plan.

Despite himself, Ryuu felt a curl of fear snaking up inside of his gut. Please, Shizurugi, don't let me down. If we lose you as well, then we're finished here.

The sword did not respond verbally, though Ryuu saw a glitter of purple light run from hilt to tip, and he felt reassured. Dangerous as it was, Shizurugi was as invested in the fight as he was, and would not give up, no matter what the cost.

What happened next was difficult for Ryuu's stressed brain to properly fathom at first. Shirogane had fired a blast of Oukasen, on a direct collision course with Haruya's mask, only to see it punched into oblivion by the man's broad fists, prickles of noxious reiryoku disintegrating Shirogane's attack like acid through wood. A Cero had followed, and Shirogane had neatly ducked and dodged it, the ground exploding into another flare of red light.

Yet as the Cero touched the earth, the whole world went deathly silent. Instead of the sound of exploding energy against mud and slime, there was nothing. Haruya's grunts, his heavy steps, Shirogane's explosions of spirit power... all were suddenly silent, as though Ryuu was watching them through a screen of soundproof glass. The world around him was still moving, still breathing... but he could no longer match sounds with actions. He glanced at his Vice Captain, seeing the man's lips move, but hearing no words come out. Haruya too had hesitated, apparently confused by the sudden mute on their surroundings, and Ryuu knew that it was not something the Hollow-man had done, but instead, something from outside.

And then, from nowhere, the final remaining house on the near edge of the abandoned village exploded into a silent fountain of splinters and shrapnel, sending Shirogane diving to the ground, hands clapped over his ears as though trying to protect his hearing from the silence that was all around them. This seemed nonsensical, yet Ryuu followed suit, acting more because Shirogane had than because the action made sense. The next instant he was glad he had, for even through the skin and bone of his fingers, he was aware of the most tremendous rumble of energy, a sudden mingling and merging of all the missing sounds crashing and exploding against one another in the atmosphere. The splinters of wood dropped like tiny blades into the soft soil, and Haruya let out a scream, clapping his own hands to his head and staggering back. Ryuu was not sure if it was the sudden volume of mingled noises or the rain of wooden shards that had shaken him, but as he looked, he could see that, where the mask had previously been a perfect white shell, now it showed chips and cracks across the edges. One of the horns had broken, but Ryuu could see nothing physical that could have caused such damage, and he frowned, his eyes flitting once more in Shirogane's direction. His Vice Captain's attention was fixed on something else, however, and Ryuu followed the line of his cousin's gaze, his eyes widening in disbelief as he made out the fact they were no longer alone.

Standing on the edge of the abandoned village, his haori still pristine despite the mud and muck that surrounded them was the Captain of the Sixth Division, and he did not look at all amused. In his hand he grasped the hilt of a long, curved sword, though Ryuu found it hard to make out the sharp edge of the blade. It appeared to be breathing, humming and vibrating with life and energy, and as he stepped forward into the midst of the battle scene, he cast his gaze from Ryuu to Shirogane, before resting it on the dazed figure of Haruya himself.

“Ryuu, Shirogane, you are done here.”

Guren did not raise his voice, yet the words carried through the thin atmosphere, and Ryuu scrambled hurriedly to his feet, bowing his head in deference to his Captain. Shirogane had acted likewise, and from the expression on the Vice Captain's face, Ryuu knew that this was not one of the times when Guren's authority could be swayed by his fondness for his oldest nephew.

“Go to the river, take charge of the others, and make yourselves presentable. I will talk to you properly later, but I am tired of waiting, and so will clean up the mess you seem incapable of mopping up for yourself,” Guren's words were soft and even, yet ringing with intent, and Ryuu shivered, reminding himself that, as close as their working relationship had become in the past quarter of a century, back in District Six, his uncle still had a fearsome reputation. He raised his hand in a salute, glancing at Shirogane, then disappearing into shunpo, heading in the direction of the river without a thought of turning or even glancing back. He could tell that Shirogane was hot on his tail, eager to obey the instruction as quickly as possible.

As he dropped out of his flash-step at the edge of the riverside meeting place, he felt a hand on his arm, and he glanced up, seeing the serious look on Shirogane's face.

“I might not be disciplining you, but we might both face trouble, later,” he said quietly. “Guren-sama is cross, Ryuu. Maybe because you abandoned your men, maybe because I abandoned mine... maybe because two young ones took injury, or because we failed to clean up a Hollow problem when there were two of us and only one of him. Whichever it is, I hope you're resolved.”

“It strikes me that Taichou's anger is a good match for the Hollow's rage,” Ryuu turned his gaze back in the direction they had come. “I am resigned, Fukutaichou. We failed in our brief, yet I am relieved, rather than shamed that Guren-sama came to our aid. I was not confident we could win... I think the enemy we faced was stronger than we were able to manage, even working as a team.”

“I think so too,” Shirogane's admission was reluctant, but honest, and he cast Ryuu a sheepish grin. “I wasn't sure if you heard my warning clearly or not — I'm glad you followed my lead and covered your ears. I didn't think you'd seen Tenkyourei in its released state before, and it can be a nasty jolt if you're not expecting it — as I think that Haruya found out.”

“Tenkyourei...” Ryuu remembered the shimmering, vibrating blade, and shook his head. ‘I didn’t know what was going on, but I thought that you wouldn’t drop into mud again unless there was a good reason, so I copied you,’ he admitted. “I have never seen Guren-sama release his zanpakutou, though I know it has a legendary reputation. He never uses it in training sessions, and I am not sure whether he has used it on a deployment mission since I joined Sixth Squad.”

“I’ve trained against it, some, in shikai, but the last time he released it was probably before Seiren-dono’s illness,” Shirogane reflected thoughtfully. “I don’t know what, but I think Kinnya-sama said something to him — something about the dangers of being willing and able to release a sword of that much power in a battle and that, perhaps, it was better to deploy lesser officers and build their training than always rushing into battle himself. Guren-sama thinks highly of Kinnya-sama, and I think, once he felt he had you and I to back him up, he followed that advice... but today, we have failed him.”

“We have,” “Ryuu acknowledged,” but I have never been so relieved to see him — nor so frightened of him. I imagine the Hollow will not be so cocky with Guren-sama looking like that.”

“He might not have time to be anything, not if Guren-sama is really intending to kill him quickly,” Shirogane mused. “Tenkyourai controls soundwaves, and uses them to create sonic explosions, like the one we just saw. That’s not the limit of the weapon’s power, though... and I suspect that Guren-sama sent us away because of that fact. We should go join the others, and make sure those two injured juniors are doing all right. This far away, we should be safe from any fallout — but just in case, I think that, while we should be on our guard for Keitarou, we must make especially sure that not a single man tries to leave the riverbank, not until the Captain returns.”

“Senpai?” Ryuu cast his companion a confused look, and Shirogane offered him a grim smile.

“Trust me,” he said simply. “Guren-sama’s Bankai is not something you want to see. In fact, there’s a reason why the only people who have ever seen it are Grandfather, when training him, and Genryuusai-sensei, when ratifying its existence for the Council of Elders. It is not the kind of Bankai you show someone... and there are not many people with spirit power that equal or surpass our Uncle’s level well enough to withstand it. Grandfather, Kinnya-sama, Genryuusai-sensei — maybe Unohana-taichou, from the things I’ve heard... but you or I? In our current state...”

He shook his head.

“We stay here. Those are my orders, and the Captain’s,” he said decidedly. “Let’s do as Guren-sama told us, Ryu. Clean up and take command here... and be glad that, whatever punishment we might later face, it won’t be the kind of discipline handed out by Tenkyourei’s blade.”

“Well, I guess we can say with some certainty that there’s no Keitarou in these parts right at the moment,”

Midori let out a gusty sigh, setting aside the pile of papers she had been flicking through. “If he wanted us to come here, and so put that girl outside, he’s letting us take our time looking through everything. Of course, maybe he didn’t expect us to find the place so quickly — but it seems more likely to me that, if he was on the prowl nearby, he’d have come out to defend his puppet when he sensed her in peril.”

“Your attack was quick enough, and he’d realise there was nothing to be done,” Nagesu’s response was distracted, his gaze fixed on the volume in front of him, pale eyes darting from line to line as he absorbed the contents of what he was reading. To Midori, the tightly packed characters were little more than shorthand squiggles without logic or coherence, but from the increasing gravity on her companion’s features, she surmised that, to Nagesu, they were more confirmation of their earlier suspicions. “I’m concerned, Midori-dono. Concerned about what this all means, but more, by why we’re really here.”

“I thought we were here looking for Keitarou, as per the Council’s order,” Midori folded her arms, eying her neighbour expectantly. “Isn’t that what was decided? You’re presiding Council Head, so with all respect, I’m surprised if you don’t remember. You were the one who made the final decision to bring us here, and so...”

“And so...” Nagesu echoed, shutting the volume with a snap and reaching up to remove his spectacles. He set them down on the dusty unit, running his fingers through his unruly fair hair with a groan. “I’m sorry. What we’ve found here is beyond my expectations and far, far worse than I feared when we first entered the mountain. I had anticipated finding evidence of Keitarou’s work, perhaps Keitarou himself — but instead, to be greeted with...”

“Treason of the highest order,” Midori’s own expression became sober. “And treason you cannot act upon.”

“No... not me,” Nagesu shook his head. “That door is shut, locked and bolted, but it doesn’t make the truth any easier to swallow.”

He rested his hand atop the thick volume with a grimace.

“Everything here must, somehow, be returned to Seireitei and examined in full view of the Council, of course. There’s no alternative,” he added. “In the meantime, my cousin is still on the loose somewhere — probably congratulating himself on leaving such a paper trail here that would distract anyone’s attention.”

“You really believe Keitarou is here?” Midori arched an eyebrow. “We’ve searched this place, and it’s very convenient, if you ask me. All these papers laid out, just waiting for you to find them. The secret chamber in which these creatures were apparently kept, open and accessible enough that it took me only a matter of moments to locate its opening mechanism. True, I’m trained in secret arts and stealth tricks, but even so, it wasn’t much of a challenge. Don’t you think this entire scene has been laid out as a form of smokescreen — telling you things you don’t want to read, in order to distract you from the reality?”

“Which is?” Nagesu scooped up his glasses, rubbing the lenses absently on his dusty sleeves before returning them to his nose.

“Well, Keitarou isn’t a Shihouin, and I’m not a mad genius,” Midori said categorically, crossing the room towards the far wall and absently flicking up the switch that activated the hidden door separating the laboratory from the confinement chamber beyond. “For that reason, I might be reading him wrong. But to go to all of this trouble to suggest that he’s recently been here, and is still here, I begin to wonder whether or not he ever really was. As a Shihouin, I’d have very little respect for an enemy who left such a blatant trail to his true base’s location.”

“You don’t think he’s in the Real World at all, do you?” Nagesu demanded sharply, and Midori shrugged her shoulders, allowing the door to slide back and click shut.

“I wasn’t sure either way,” she acknowledged. “I wouldn’t say I thought he wasn’t here, only that there were things we needed to face up to and answer before it was conclusive that he was. That’s why I volunteered my services here, but left Kai and the Onmitsukidou behind. I split my forces, just in case... I wanted some insurance, because it didn’t seem wise to me that four full, Clan, Council divisions vacate Seireitei to hunt for a character known to be slipperier than most kinds of snake. Especially considering that Yuuichi-dono was heading to the Academy... it seemed high-risk that the only Council shinigami remaining in Inner Seireitei were Retsu-sama and Hirata... both of whom lead divisions who have suffered significant losses as a result of events so far. Kai might not be Council, but he is sensible, and I felt he could be of use.”

“And now, your conclusion is..?”

“I think probably, Keitarou is not camping in the Real World, but at some point, he was here. Quite recently, perhaps, in order to lay this out so perfectly for you,” Midori mused. “It must have been for you, which is almost certainly why that girl attacked you the first time, and again today. You’re the only one who could possibly read those documents and realise their true significance. To me they’re just dusty pieces of paper and old scientific texts, nothing more important than that. It takes an Urahara to read shorthand written by an Urahara.”

“Mm,” Nagesu looked pained. “The one who taught me most of my notation skills was my uncle, Keitsune. Keitarou’s father... this is his cipher, although imperfect in places, it’s enough to be legible. The only people who ever learned it were those who worked with him directly. That includes Daigo-dono... and Father had me trained in it, too. Daigo-dono completed my education in it, in fact — and I fixed the imperfections in that training with the surviving notes Uncle left behind. There weren’t many — some were destroyed, others spirited away — and I imagine that’s how Keitarou learned to read it. He is a genius, and most likely, those who helped raise him were able to give him guidance where Keitsune-jisama could not.”

He rubbed his brow.

“My uncle would’ve been horrified to know how much his work had been mutated, manipulated and used, even by his own son,” he murmured. “He loved Keitarou more than anything, and I was always so very jealous that my cousin had a father who was so kind, attentive and warm, when I had... to live up to my father’s strict expectations. My uncle made mistakes, but they were not malicious ones and nothing that happened as a result of his experiments was with evil intent. By contrast... this... all of this...”

“If you ask me, Keitsune-dono sounds ill-suited for a back-stabbing Clan world, and paid the price,” Midori said pragmatically. “I’m too young to have met him, but it strikes me that, if he had made wiser decisions, he might still be alive now and we might not be trying to prevent a wholesale rebellion from his far too clever only son.”

“As you say,” Nagesu agreed wearily. “Sometimes I wonder if I have that same characteristic. I’ve tried so hard to bring my family back together, but regardless...”

He shook his head, as though trying to clear the negative thoughts from it, and Midori pursed her lips.

“Do you regret sanctioning our coming here?” she asked softly, and Nagesu glanced at her sharply, before shrugging.

“Ukitake tried to convince me we should not,” he admitted. “He came to speak to me, and I confess, I didn’t fully understand the reasons why he was so against a Real World deployment. He was fixated with Rukongai, and the events of twenty five years ago... and asking about souls in the Rukon Valley, in areas we know to be deserted. Now I come here and I find this, and I can’t help thinking... that maybe he knew something. Something he couldn’t tell me, but something of great importance.”

“Juushirou isn’t usually the kind to hold back if he has those kinds of feelings,” Midori said thoughtfully. “I’m sure if he had suspected something of this nature, or had evidence of it, he’d have brought it to you directly. The Rukongai angle is interesting, however...”

“Oh?” Nagesu glanced at his companion, and Midori nodded.

“My brother,” she said simply. “According to my aide, Saku — who is also Kai’s second in command — Kai had a visit from Juushirou and Shunsui-dono not more than a few days ago. They chose to appear when I was away from my barracks, which I thought was interesting. True, it could have just been a friendly housecall — both of them have close bonds with my brother, even now — but though he didn’t discuss it with me, I had the impression Kai was preoccupied that night. Then, the day we left, I heard him speaking to a couple of the Onmitsukidou officers. I didn’t overhear the whole conversation, but I am sure I heard him mention the Spiritless Zone.”

“The..Spiritless Zone?” Nagesu blinked.

“Yes,” Midori confirmed. “Does that sound at all like whatever Juushirou asked you?”

“Ukitake wanted to know about the incident in the Rukon twenty five years ago, and also, about the transfer of souls with spirit power following the inauguration of the Spiritless Zone,” Nagesu’s expression became thoughtful. “He wanted to know specifically about them... but I told them that we’d swept Rukongai dry and there were no souls with spirit power remaining after the violent incidents we now know more about. Everyone else was moved to the Spiritless Zone, and that was that. I gave him the official report and he left... that was the last time we discussed it. He seemed surprised, though, that there were no souls with spirit power living in Rukongai.”

“Maybe that’s what he couldn’t tell you,” Midori moved to the desk, carefully beginning to gather together papers. “He knew something that official report did not. The big questions are what, and perhaps, how.”

“Midori-dono?”

“We’ve spent enough time here,” Midori’s hands did not pause, and she turned to offer her companion a brief grin. “There are enough idle officers outside to come down here and pack and prepare the evidence for transference, and since you and perhaps Shiketsu-dono are the only ones likely to be able to read the contents, it won’t create an uproar if we send lesser ranks to take care of that. We’re Captains, Nagesu-sama, and we came here with a job to do. True, it’s turned out to be a different one than the one we anticipated, but it’s still important.”

“Meaning what, exactly?”

“Keitarou laid a trap for us, and we need to make sure we spring it fully,” Midori dropped her pile on the side of the desk with a thump, beginning to pull together a second. “It’s pretty clear to me right now that your cousin isn’t here, which means we need to begin looking for him someplace else. But, we’re shinigami, and protecting lives is what we need to do, not just protecting ourselves and the community in which we live. We came looking for Keitarou, but we found Hollow-monsters and it’s our duty to deal with them. One is dead, and there are two more of considerable spiritual power roaming free around the landscape. Leaving them here alive to devour or mutilate members of the living population is against every shinigami value there has ever been, and so we can’t waste any time in ensuring they are dispatched. Only, I think it’s a good idea we make sure this place is made safe as quickly as we can. If Juushirou was talking about the Spiritless Zone, and Kai also mentioned it, it suggests to me that there’s something else going on that nobody has bothered to tell us about. And the sooner we go back and discover what that is, the better.”

64. Urami

Chapter Sixty Three: Urami

The wind rattled and howled around the perimeters of the Ninth Division, fragments of broken tiling and splintered wood creaking loose from the damaged fronting. It had been a bright, tranquil start to the day, weather-wise, but within the Ninth, the breeze had picked up.

The Wind Hawk was about to fly free.

Hirata's grip on his sword's hilt tightened, the vibrating currents of air circulating the blade's gleaming surface making it difficult for him to see anything reflected in the metal. The moment his daughter and the other members of Seventh Division had disappeared into the Ninth's building, he had released Tsumi no Fuuhi, and little by little the curl of killer instinct that he kept sealed and locked up inside of him had begun to unfurl its wings, extending its talons in expectation of the battle to come. The sensation made him both giddy and sick to his stomach, for he had spent so much of his life fighting the predatorial instinct that, on occasion, consumed him. He knew from past experience that he could kill, and kill without remorse. But this would be killing a comrade and a fellow Captain, and for that, he knew he needed his head clear.

Otherwise there would be nothing left of Anabomi for further Council investigations.

The other Captain's sword was gripped so tightly in his hand that Hirata quickly realised the blood that covered his fist was not from his victims but from his own nails sharpening to claws and cutting through the skin of his palm. In contrast to the warping of his face and upper body, Anabomi's fingers had retained their slender elegance, and the soft fabric fingerless glove that extended over them was intact, though spotted with more of the seeping red liquid. The transformation was incomplete, the man was neither fully Hollow nor still a Shinigami, and Hirata racked his brains, trying to remember a time when he had encountered such a thing before.

His mind was blank.

Still Anabomi did not attack.

The man appeared wary of the rising and dipping thrusts of air running around the inside of his Division compound, for Hirata could see the reptilian red eyes darting here and there, following every creak and every falling splinter of wood. He opened his mouth, letting out a war cry of defiance, but he did not advance, and this hesitation put Hirata on edge. Every inch of Anabomi's body seemed to emit killer intent, but his actions belied it. Had his companion truly become a monster? Or was it something else?

Hirata gritted his teeth, pushing the thoughts aside. This was no longer Anabomi, and it was no time to be squeamish. Officers of the Ninth lay dead inside, and more would be killed if he did not put things straight here and now. It was down to him to do what he knew he could do — unleash Seizumi and allow the wind to do its work.

Yet still there was a standoff, neither side wanting to make the first move and risk falling into a strategic trap. Hirata had never known a Hollow to understand strategy before, and it, too, unnerved him, for he knew that Anabomi had always had a good reputation in battle skills.

Well, so did he, and more. Hirata gazed at Tsumi no Fuuhi's blade, imagining for a moment that as much blood stained its surface as currently adorned his opposite number. There had been times, in Seventh District, where it had not been his imagination, but the reality. There had been times when, as Third Seat of the Thirteenth Division he had rooted out assassins aiming for his Captain's life and had dealt with them mercilessly, vaporising them with a blast of air so intense and potent that all that had remained of the corpse was a spray of blood across his blade. Once, Juushirou had caught him in the act, and Hirata had never forgotten the conversation that had followed.

"If my life is in danger," the man had said, "I will fight to protect it. A Captain doesn't ask his subordinates to shed blood for him, Hirata. I won't ever ask you to use Tsumi no Fuuhi in such a way again, not so long as you're a part of Thirteenth — and then, after that, as your friend. I'm glad my life is important to you, but that doesn't mean other lives should be shed in its place. There are other forms of justice than simply death."

It had been like a splash of cold water on his sanity, quieting the hunter in a way nobody and nothing else had ever managed to do, and for the rest of his time in Thirteenth's colours, Hirata had not unleashed his Wind Hawk on any other individuals, no matter how deserving he had felt them to be. He had saved his ire and his power for dispatching Hollows, and, when he had inherited the haori of Seventh Division at long last, had asked both Shunsui and Juushirou to ensure that he never crossed that line and used his abilities to kill in such a ruthless way again.

Now, he was contemplating using the sword he had strictly reserved for Hollows, to kill a man he had worked with for several years, and more, one whose ability to process rational thought was still under question. Releasing the Wind Hawk was easy, it was instinct and to do so would bring a sense of relief, allowing to flow free on the breeze all the pent up emotions that had lurked within him since Souja's tragic death. Still, Hirata did not want to give in to it. He remembered Juushirou's face, his expression and his disappointment, and he knew that he did not want to see that face again.

And then, just when he thought the stalemate would go on forever, Anabomi moved.

It was a flash-step of sorts, almost shunpo, but not quite, and it took the distracted Hirata momentarily off guard. At the last minute he saw the bared blade swinging down towards him, sending blood spatter across the white fabric of his haori, and he cursed, flinging Tsumi no Fuuhi up to meet the attack. Momentarily the gusts of wind around his zanpakutou warped and scattered, leaving his sword blade bare, but the Seventh Captain quickly gathered his composure, drawing his weapon through the atmosphere and turning Anabomi's lunge into an opportunity to counter. For a moment he unleashed his hold on his spirit power, allowing his survival instincts to kick in. With a ruthless, unrelenting series of strikes and parries, he pushed Anabomi onto the back foot, and his opponent let out a shriek, disappearing and re-appearing a few metres away.

Hirata was already breathing hard, the disruption of air-current around his sword having temporarily lowered the oxygen entering his body, and he reached his free hand up to push his hair out of his face. Anabomi had got close enough to him to cut through the tie that had held it back, and he knew that, a moment later, he would have had his head removed from his shoulders.

He grimaced, sizing up the situation afresh.

Hirata had always been weak with a sword, and even now, he could only fight a proper battle, weapon to weapon, if he allowed his sword's spirit to take control of the fight. Anabomi, by contrast, was a Kuchiki who had probably trained from infancy to hold his weapon well, and, from the dexterity of his companion's movement, Hollowfication did not seem to be impairing his abilities. There would be no opportunity for distance in this encounter, no recourse to offensive Kidou, nor would a game of cat and mouse suffice. This was a sword fight, pure and simple, and even with his zanpakutou released, Hirata felt suddenly that he was at a disadvantage.

Anabomi's next attack came from behind him, a surge and shift in the atmosphere telling Hirata the second before his opponent dropped out of his strange, shunpo step that something was afoot. He swung around, smashing his blade into Anabomi's speculative swing, but the Hollow Captain had him in his sights now, and the gleaming red eyes bore down on him, as his opponent launched a fierce assault. A frantic exchange of blows followed, with Hirata finding himself pushed further and further back against the marble wall which separated Eighth from Ninth. The structure was already cracked, Hirata suspected from the fighting going on on its other side, but it was not cracked enough for him to use his Wind Hawk to loosen stones or create an avalanche. Drawing on the skills his father had taught him as a child, he drew a shield of Kyokkou down over his body, knowing that it would probably not last long but taking advantage of his momentary cloaking to slip and duck out of Anabomi's immediate line of sight. The other Captain paused, apparently confused by his sudden disappearance, and in that moment of hesitation, Hirata spied his opening.

"Bakudou no Ichi, Sai!" he exclaimed, thrusting his left hand out towards Anabomi's sword arm. As the jolt of Kidou leapt through the atmosphere between him, Anabomi's right arm stiffened and dropped against his body, clearly fighting for free movement but in vain. His opponent thus neutered, Hirata allowed his sword to sweep away the Kyokkou cloak, darting forward and taking his foe completely off guard. Buoyed by momentum, Hirata was able to break into Anabomi's personal space, thrusting the tip of his weapon up towards his companion's throat. The vibrating swirls of air current that surrounded the blade began to tease and pull at the edges of Anabomi's misshapen mask, creating thin, hairline cracks across the edge of the white surface.

Hirata opened his lips, about to give his sword the command to end his opponent's life, when suddenly, something made him pause.

"Kill me,"

Fragments of the mask began to crumble away from the edges of Anabomi's face, and Hirata heard his companion speak, the words rough and raw-edged, but unmistakably the voice of his fellow Captain. The reddish eyes had dulled, and, as a fragment of chalk broke away from Anabomi's cheekbone, Hirata could now see that there were tears glittering against his lashes. Tsumi no Fuuhi's blade was still poised inches away from his companion's throat, but with those two words, Hirata knew that his companion still had rationality beneath his mask. He was not yet Hollow. He was still Anabomi, and as Anabomi, he had reached out to speak.

"Anabomi?" Tentatively, he voiced the man's name.

"Don't talk to me. Kill me," Anabomi's words were desperate and urgent, and Hirata could see the pain now glittering in his companion's gaze. "I killed my men. I would've killed you. Please, Hirata-dono. Kill me."

Hirata's blade twitched closer to Anabomi's skin, then he paused, shaking his head.

"I want to know what happened," he said quietly. "Keitarou was controlling you, I know that — Takaoka reported that you were under someone else's manipulation. The deaths of your men are on his hands, not yours. But this... this appearance... I don't understand."

"I wanted to stop myself," Anabomi's words were little more than a whisper now, as though something was swelling and closing around his windpipe, making it hard for him to expel the words through raw vocal chords. "Keitarou will make me kill... again... and again. I thought I had rid myself of him, but he's still there. It didn't work, and now... now I will kill everyone... if you... don't kill me."

His eyes closed, a ripple of pain crossing his brow, and Hirata hesitated, knowing that it was not just physical but emotional pain that was traumatising his companion.

"Anabomi..."

"I will not shame the Ninth," Anabomi's eyes snapped open, and for a moment, they were grey, as the Captain's resolve rallied inside of him. "I will not shame them like this, Hirata-dono. Please, understand that. Whether Keitarou killed my men or not, this is... my Ninth. I won't... be the cause... of more pain among my men."

Another ripple of pain crossed the man's brow, and then Hirata felt the noxious reiryoku begin to bubble and prick against his skin once more, as the violent, Hollow impulses Anabomi had been fighting tooth and nail to suppress in order to get his message across began to regain the upper hand.

"Keitarou... won't let me... kill myself," the words were stretched thin and hoarse, the desperate attempt of a man to hold on to the last vestiges of his sanity. "And a Kuchiki who kills himself... brings... more shame. If you kill me... then I... and Ninth... it will all... be well. Please, Hirata-dono. I have never asked for anything from... my comrades before, but this one time... I... will... I will ask. Please. For Ninth. Kill me.”

With that the tears that had glittered against Anabomi's dark lashes began to solidify and turn white, a thick, oozing layer of Hollow mask that trickled forth to repair the cracks. Anabomi's reiryoku erupted in a violent pulse of dark energy, his eyes gleaming once more in predatorial, reptilian red as he let out an incoherent, earsplitting screech. Light glittered around the hilt of the sword still held in the man's hand, and just in time Hirata realised that it was Cero, aimed at point-blank range towards his own midsection. Cursing his moment of hesitation, he slipped into shunpo, withdrawing across the courtyard as the Cero took full form, a luminescent flare of azure energy that exploded against the remains of the Division's barrier fence and left it, not in pieces, but in fragments of black ash. Anabomi's desperate fight to prevent the Hollow impulses penetrating his native, Kuchiki reiryoku was clearly fading, and Hirata's Sai was torn to shreds by the force of the blast. As he watched, the other man's left arm swelled and and twisted out of its normal sockets, the flesh splitting to reveal bone that mutated from the inside out, extending long skeletal protrusions to encase the damaged limb in an external shell. Anabomi let out another terrifying shriek, but now Hirata understood that it was not Hollow defiance, but true despair and agony that rent through the man's vocal chords, and his earlier doubts began to slip away.

Even after hearing Sakura's report, he had come to Ninth resolved to restrain and immobilise his fellow Captain, but the moment he had seen the mask, he had known that option was gone. Briefly he had faltered, reminded of Ryu's father Seiren and the miracle cure that had been effected on his Hollow state so many years before. For that moment he had considered whether Anabomi's moment of sanity would, somehow, allow him to regain control of his body and his mind. But, as he surveyed his companion with a heavy heart, Hirata knew that Seiren's situation had been different. In that case, native spirit power had mutated out of all control, and had subsequently been removed. Here, Anabomi's carefully controlled, potent reiryoku had been poisoned with an unknown toxin, a symptom for which there was no cure. Whether it was reidoku or not, the end result was the same. Those questions could be asked later, but if he did not act now, there would be no later. Anabomi had understood far more quickly what the true cost of this encounter was. In this instance, even Juushirou would understand the use of the Wind Hawk. Even Juushirou would forgive it, if this time the only justice left was to kill. Anabomi made Takaoka cry for help, because he wanted to be stopped.

That's what she said, and now I understand that order, only too well. Anabomi came out to fight me. Maybe Keitarou sent him to kill me, but he came for another reason. He came because he believed I could stop him. He didn't mean he wanted to be stopped and restrained, but stopped so he could not move again. Guilty or not, Anabomi's heart is with the Ninth and the people he was made to kill. I was naive to think that simply restraining a possessed Captain would ever have been enough... or that, in trying to save him, I might actually make his pain worse.

Hirata gritted his teeth, as the whirls of wind that surrounded Tsumi no Fuuhi's blade began to pick up, sending nearby fragments of broken wood scattering across the cobbles, and pieces of black charcoal dust swirled in ominous clouds around the courtyard. Whatever drove him to turn Hollow, whether it was his own desperation or something else, the road ends here. A Captain in his right mind has asked a favour of me, and its a favour that I can grant. In the circumstances, these are the costs of war. Sometimes you kill, sometimes you are killed, and sometimes you do what's best, whether you wish to do it or not.

He lowered his weapon, angling the blade so that it was on a direct collision course for the vicinity of Anabomi's heart. It was not yet covered by the slick substance that, bit by bit, was taking apart his comrade's body, but there was no guarantee that, if he waited any longer, this would not occur. He knew from his studies at the Academy that a Hollow's heart was manifested in its mask, and so he could only hope and pray that he had not left it too long. There was no sign of a hole in Anabomi's chest, not yet, but Hirata knew that did not mean his colleague had not made a full transition beneath the surface. He was changing quickly now, the blood that had poured from his split arm congealing and drying up as though the heart was beginning to evolve into something else, and if Hirata waited any longer, it would be too late.

Muttering a curse under his breath, Hirata wrapped his left hand over the top of his right, and in the recesses of his mind, he could see the image of the hawk, hovering and ready, in anticipation of the kill. Silently, he gave Seizumi the consent it had waited impatiently to hear, and the air around Tsumi no Fuuhi's blade suddenly grew more intense, till Hirata could barely see his target on the other side. Another, whispered word passed his lips, drowned out by the whirling of the wind, and the blast of air seared from the silver weapon across the open space that separated the two men.

Anabomi was preparing a second Cero blast, but, once unleashed, Tsumi no Fuuhi's wind tornado was unforgiving and relentless, and it split apart the attack into its component spiritual atoms, causing the fragments of damaged reiryoku to scatter like dying embers onto the stone below. Hirata had half expected Anabomi to try to evade, for it was clear that his rationality was gradually being swallowed up by aggressive Hollow instincts, but to his surprise, the man turned to meet the attack. The slender fingers of his undamaged right hand parted slightly, allowing the zanpakutou he held to fall harmlessly to the ground in a symbolic gesture of surrender. Time appeared to move in slow motion as Tsumi no Fuuhi's whirlwind met its mark, burrowing through the Ninth Captain's left chest with unyielding precision. It was a controlled attack, so much as Hirata ever had control — enough to kill, but not enough to destroy. A spray of blood told Hirata that he had probably been in time, and that he had killed his opponent before the transformation to Hollow had been able to complete. With a jolt time returned to itself, and Anabomi's body was sent flying across the ground, landing with a thud on the cold stone.

The wind hushed, silence pervading the entire arena, and Hirata gave his sword a little shake, sealing the hunter away before stepping carefully over the debris towards where his opposite number now lay.

Despite the ferocity of the mutation, the fragments of chalk and mutated bone were beginning to crumble and break away, surrounding the corpse in an odd white dust. Hirata knelt down at the man's side, reaching up a hand to brush away the worst of it from the man's face. Though the left arm was mangled, the shoulders dislocated and broken out of their normal alignment, Anabomi's face was unscarred by the episode, and as Hirata put his fingers to the other's throat in automatic search for a pulse, the man's eyes twitched, then flickered open. Startled, Hirata drew back as though stung by a wasp, his gaze darting to the oozing, bloody chest wound and then back to Anabomi's face in disbelief. Anabomi's heart had been torn to shreds by Tsumi no Fuuhi's blast, yet his companion was not yet dead. Had he been too late after all? Had the Hollow taken enough of Anabomi's power and sanity to make him able to survive a normally fatal wound? Inwardly he cursed himself — he had intended a quick, painless blow, not a lingering death for his companion, yet it appeared that his moment of doubt had caused him to fail.

The fingers of Anabomi's right hand brushed feebly against Hirata's, their movement so slight that, had it not been for the movement of the eyes, Hirata would have dismissed it as a final muscular death spasm. He returned his gaze to the other shinigami's face, realising that Anabomi's expression was peaceful, and there was relief, not pain in his eyes. As the two gazes met, Anabomi's lips parted.

“Thank you.”

The word was not voiced, merely a hiss of air passing between lips as the last breath left Anabomi's lungs, but Hirata understood it. As the light began to fade from Anabomi's grey eyes, he let out a heavy sigh, setting Tsumi no Fuuhi aside and lifting his sword arm to gently close the lids. His blow had indeed been fatal, but Anabomi had held on just those few moments more in order to convey that final message. He understands the guilt of killing a comrade, so sought to relieve me of the same burden.

Hirata got slowly to his feet, retrieving his sword and gazing down at the corpse with some regret as he slid Tsumi no Fuuhi into its scabbard.

But I am an Endou, Anabomi. Unlike you, I can kill and not feel emotion for it. I regret that I had no other choice, but I will recover from it sooner than you think. For you, Keitarou's actions ended your whole world, and even if you had lived, you would never have been able to forgive yourself for what occurred here today. Those emotions are ones I wish I could feel, but I don't. I can't feel like that about killing... I can only regulate myself according to the values of those around me, in order not to become a monster. I suppose that's how the Endou and the Kuchiki truly differ. Still, I do realise that this was the easiest way out for you — and with the Hollowfication, the only path. There is no cure for what afflicted you... and all Hollows must be destroyed, regardless of who they once were. But I will remember your words about Ninth, and make sure they are reported in full to the Council. Your Division will not be allowed to suffer more than it already has — for that, Anabomi, you have my word. That, and one other thing. The man behind this will not escape us this time. We will make a corpse of him. He will pay — for my son's life, and now, for yours, too.

“Taichou,”

Hajime materialised in the yard that moment, casting Anabomi's corpse no more than a cursitory glance, before approaching Hirata's position and dropping his head in an apologetic bow.

“I'm sorry, sir, I know you ordered us not to return here, but I felt the Wind Hawk swell and I realised that the fight here was done,” he said respectfully. “I came to report to you at once the conditions within the Ninth — I don't think any time can be wasted in doing so.”

“I see,” Hirata turned his back on his dead comrade with a heavy sigh. “Very well, I'll hear your report. What have you found, Hajime?”

“We have located the survivors of the Ninth Division, cowering in cellars beneath the Division buildings,” Hajime’s lips curled slightly in disdain. “I sent Nakata and Takaoka to deal with them, and they all flocked around Takaoka as though she were a mother hen when she appeared. It seems they sensed the flares of spirit power and heard screams, so ran to hide, as grown men are apparently prone to do in Kuchiki divisions.”

“In this circumstance, it appears to have been the correct decision,” Hirata said wearily. “How many survivors are we talking about?”

“Fourteen, sir, at last count,” Hajime said briskly. “Takaoka is certain that at least fifteen other officers are currently out on patrol, though, sir. I don’t know the exact figures for Ninth Division, but I believe there may be another ten or twelve officers currently unaccounted for. It’s possible they are undertaking duties in Sixth Division’s territory, due to Guren-sama’s absence. Takaoka wasn’t clear — she said that Mikihara organised all the deployments, and she wasn’t part of it.”

“So we believe that Ninth Division may have weathered the storm better than we first feared?” Hirata’s gaze flitted towards the dead Anabomi, recalling the last, gasped words of thanks, and the relief that had glittered in the grey eyes in the brief moment before they had glazed over. Hajime bit his lip, then shook his head.

“No, sir. I’m afraid it’s not like that at all.”

“Then...?”

“As far as we can ascertain, sir, Takaoka Sakura is the highest ranking survivor of what occurred at Ninth Division this morning. There are no officers currently out on patrol who supersede her rank, and the carnage in Anabomi’s office speaks for the rest.”

“As bad as that?” Hirata’s eyes became grave. “Then... Mikihara too..?”

“We found him, but I couldn’t get a response from him.” Hajime agreed. “I’m not a healer, but he’s not in a good shape and I’m sure he wasn’t breathing. I think we can say that Takaoka’s mercy call came too late.”

“Anabomi was a powerful Captain,” Hirata murmured, glancing at the dead body once more. “More, perhaps, than he ever gave away — but he was a Kuchiki, and what they say about Kuchiki reiatsu is often no exaggeration. Still, Mikihara and the others are also Kuchiki, so I had hoped... maybe...”

“It looks at the moment as though Takaoka wasn’t exaggerating in what she told us back at Seventh,” Hajime’s expression was grim. “The office is awash with blood. There’s no nice way to say it, sir — it’s a bloodbath. Kikyue-hime and I examined the scene as best we could, then closed the door and left it. We touched nothing, just confirmed that there was nobody with life within its walls.”

“And where is Joumei in all of this?” Hirata questioned. Hajime’s expression became rueful.

“Apparently he isn’t used to quite such scenes of carnage,” he admitted. “Well, he’s not an Endou, even if he has had his uses. I thought he might pass out — so made him stand outside whilst we inspected. When I left, he was fussing over Mikihara’s body, so it seems he can about handle a single corpse, but when it becomes multiple, he starts to go green around the gills. Oh, I forgot to mention it before... Mikihara is in the hallway, not Anabomi’s office. I want you to look at him too, sir. His body seems different from the others. He’s cut to ribbons, but it looks like he fought every inch, and if that’s so, it ought to be noted by a member of the Council that he acquitted himself with bravery, since heaven knows we won’t find a living witness to say as much other than the little Takaoka knows. I don’t know if he has a family back in Sixth, but if so, such details should be conveyed to them with the news of his death.”

Hirata drew a heavy breath into his lungs, then nodded.

“In the absence of the other members of the Council, I will examine the scene as best I can,” he said wearily. “Takaoka’s testimony about how this began is also going to prove very significant, if everything you’ve told me is true. She didn’t see what happened to Mikihara, but the rest, it sounds as though she did. If you say her initial, hysterical report was accurate, maybe when she’s calmer and things are under more control, we’ll know more. I think she was right about him being possessed, though. Anabomi was past all help by the time he attacked us, that much is for certain... and the only thing I know that can make a rational, reasoned man like that turn into such a monster is Keitarou’s reidoku. It stands to reason this was one of Chudokuga’s acts... but I had hoped that we would arrive in time to prevent further losses. It seems not.”

“Takaoka and the lower seats are alive, though, sir,” As the Seventh Captain began to walk into the building, Hajime fell into step with him, casting him a sidelong glance. “It occurred to me, sir, that Mikihara fought how he did because he knew there were others on the premises. Whatever assailed Anabomi-taichou, Mikihara felt he was the only one on site who even had a chance of holding his Captain back, and so he tried. He didn't evacuate, or try to save himself. It really must've been a fierce fight. I've never given much credence to the Kuchiki and the way they favour aesthetic perfection over a proper battle, but I have to admit that I rather admire Mikihara's conduct here, sir, if that's how it occurred."

Hirata's lips thinned.

And Anabomi's coming out after me, too. Mikihara wasn't the only one who fought to defend the members of Ninth. I never really knew Anabomi, and I'm sure what happened here will receive much scrutiny — but the creature I fought was more than a man possessed. He was something desperate... seeking atonement, or oblivion for what he had done to his men.

"Taichou! Taichou!" As they reached the end of the bloodsoaked corridor, Kikyue's voice hailed them, followed by the sound of her hasty footsteps, and as she skidded to a halt, Hirata put out a hand to stop her from falling headlong on the slick polished floor.

"Careful," he cautioned. "Well? What do you have to report? Hajime's told me that Anabomi's office is not particularly pretty, but..."

"Taichou, it's Mikihara," Kikyue cut across him, her eyes frantic, and she tugged at his sleeve, pulling him back in the direction from which she had just come. "It's Mikihara, sir, please, come quickly."

"Hajime already told me what happened to Mikihara. It sounds as though he fought bravely," Hirata began, but Kikyue shook her head.

"We thought he was dead. Hajime-dono and I, we both looked at him and thought... we couldn't find a pulse," she said excitedly. "But Joumei examined him, and he says Mikihara is alive."

"Alive?" Hirata gazed at her in disbelief. "But I thought... Hajime, you said he wasn't breathing, and..."

"He wasn't, and I couldn't feel a pulse, but Joumei said it was odd, how his body wasn't cold, when all the others were cooling," Kikyue grasped hold of her father's sleeve like an impatient child. "I don't know — I've never learned anything about helping wounded people, and never would've thought any more about it, but Joumei said it was different. He said he knew a way to jump-start a sluggish heart, and that he was going to try it. So he did... and now..."

"He did what to Mikihara's heart?" Hirata cast Hajime a mystified look. "I thought you said he was squeamish?"

"I guess not," Hajime looked as confused as his Captain. "But I'm sure Mikihara was dead, sir. True, he wasn't the same as the others, but I'm certain..."

"He has a pulse now," Kikyue insisted. "It was Tsuzuri Raiden. Just a little, Joumei said. He said he didn't know if it would work, but he tried it a couple of times, and now Mikihara's definitely got a pulse. Joumei was trying to start him breathing — please come, Papa, because Joumei's not authorised to do anything to a shinigami, injured or otherwise, and all of this could get people into trouble... you're the only person here who ranks above Mikihara. I didn't want to stop him, if it was helping, but if Mikihara dies now Joumei's meddled with him, if you're not there... it might be..."

"I'm coming," Despite himself, Hirata quickened his pace, rounding the corner and stopping dead at the sight that greeted him. Far from being huddled, squeamish in a corner, the young Kitsune had laid Hyakken's body on his side, an engrossed expression on his features as he worked to stem the bleeding from each of the many wounds. It was a messy task, for Hirata could quickly see that the Ninth Division Vice Captain had been torn to shreds by the sharp edge of Anabomi's blade, and for a moment he remembered his son, lying helpless and dying on the bier before him. The image shook him for a moment, then he gathered his composure, forcing the thought away.

"Joumei!" he called, and the Kitsune raised his head, relief glittering in his silverish eyes as he saw the Seventh Division Captain approaching.

"Hirata-sama!" he exclaimed. "You're not hurt... thank goodness. I felt... we all felt..."

"About Mikihara," Hirata cut across his questions, casting the young man a quizzical glance. "Kikyue says you think he's alive. He doesn't look alive to me. He looks like something tried to gut him. Are you seriously telling me that there's something of him left inside that bloody mess?"

"He's alive, sir," Joumei nodded his head. "He's lost blood, but not enough to be fatal. I've tied off the main offenders, and his pulse is a little stronger. He wasn't breathing at all when we got here, but he was still warm, so I thought that maybe... maybe he hadn't completely given up. His eyes didn't look as though he was ready to die... so I decided... I'd try. He's breathing now."

"Kikyue told me that you used Tsuzuri Raiden on him," Hirata murmured. "That was foolish — even dangerous — firing off a spell without authorisation on a man who was on the brink of death. If it had gone wrong, you realise you would have risked being arraigned for his murder. You're here on my orders, but you're not a shinigami, nor a healer, and..."

"I know," Joumei acknowledged. "And my skills are probably unconventional, but I've been utterly useless in every regard so far. I couldn't save Hiko, or protect the sick and injured among my family from Keitarou's blade. I brought danger on your Division, and I know that I will never set aside my guilt in Souja-dono's death. This man, though, I can help. More, I will help him. Kitsune learn to treat and heal each other, because there's nobody else to treat them, and sometimes they're pretty sick."

"If you had seen my brother when he was hurt, could you have saved his life, too?" Kikyue voiced the question that Hirata had not dared to ask, but Joumei shook his head.

"I understand that Souja-dono died, essentially, from loss of blood," he said gravely. "His body and his organs shut down because he had no circulation. The men in the office here, they were cut open and the entire floor is a sea of red. Even if they hadn't suffered immediately fatal wounds, they would not have been salvageable, not with that much blood loss. This man, though, the final blow was struck with Kidou. It connected with him awkwardly, and the heat of that blast cauterised the main wounds in his chest. I don't know whether his attacker knew that, or if it was a lucky coincidence, but though that Kidou shattered three of his ribs and knocked him unconscious, it's prevented him from bleeding to death. More, because he wasn't carved open in the same way as the others, his lungs and his heart weren't damaged. Most of the damage is to his gut instead... it's serious, but not as instantly fatal, and I don't think that any of the major organs there have been wrecked, either. As a result, he's clinging on to life — if he gets formal treatment now, I think he will live."

"Then Ninth Division still has a Vice Captain," Hirata murmured, relieved. "Very well. Kikyue, go to Fourth at once. Ask them to send someone — if possible, the girl Shikiki. With this kind of injury, I suspect her powers will be needed."

"Sir..." Kikyue was about to leave, but before she could, Hajime put up a hand.

"Hajime?"

"I beg pardon for my insolence, sir, but I believe that there's still grave danger in Seireitei at present,” Hajime spoke grimly. “Keitarou was controlling Anabomi-taichou and that control resulted in the slaughter of senior officers here. We don’t know how many other places have been affected. Please, allow me to go. I am more dispensible than Kikyue-hime, and whilst I may not be as swift as she is, I promise I can be relied on.”

“I don’t need protecting from everything, Hajime-dono,” Kikyue’s expression became sulky, but Hirata nodded.

“You’re right. Because the fight has ended here, I forgot that it might not be the case that it’s ended everywhere. On the contrary, it’s probably just beginning,” he acknowledged. “All right, Hajime. You go instead. Take the same orders. I expect you back in one piece... I won’t forgive you if you get killed, and certainly won’t pay for your funeral.”

“Yes, sir,” Hajime saluted. “Don’t worry. I’m a lot less interesting to Keitarou than the Endou hime would be — I imagine I don’t figure anywhere in his list of targets.”

With that he was gone, and Kikyue sighed, folding her arms and sinking down against the wall, a clear expression of dissatisfaction on her face.

“I’m not a little girl, Otousama. I can fight my corner.”

“And I won’t have you fighting Keitarou,” Hirata said firmly. “We’ve discussed this, and it remains a final decision. Besides, there’s work here you can do. If you aren’t distressed by the state of Anabomi’s office, you can go and catalogue everything that’s inside. I want a clear and detailed report to present before the Council of everything, just as we found it. Since corpses aren’t likely to pose you any danger, you can go do that. I’ll hear the rest of Joumei’s report, then join you. Understand?”

Kikyue’s pout deepened, but she gave a heavy sigh, reluctantly pulling herself back to her feet.

“Fine,” she muttered. “I wish Ohara was here, though. I could make him wade through the mess instead... at least his reaction to it would be amusing.”

With that, she stomped off towards the office with very bad grace, and Hirata sighed.

“I am an unpopular Father, but a Captain who must be obeyed,” he murmured, more to himself than to his companion, but Joumei smiled.

“I think Kikyue-hime understands,” he said softly. “And Kitabata-dono is correct. He is less likely to be a target, and Ninth is in no state to weather a fresh attack.”

He sat back on his heels, wiping his fingers against the cloth of his borrowed shihakushou.

“Mother taught Izumi and I to tie off wounds and stem bleeding, when we were young, because accidents below ground weren’t uncommon,” he added. “As for the Kidou, I saw Father use it once on a sick kinsman whose heart had stilled, and it worked, so I thought, if I was careful, I might try the same technique here. Hirata-sama, I’m not a healer. I am a scientist, of sorts, but not a gifted one like Izumi. I’m practically trained, and I try to think my way around things, but I don’t have any overwhelming talent or skill in any particular area. I am good at remembering skills I’ve been taught, and that’s all. I’ve stopped this man from dying now, but I can’t promise that he won’t still succumb to his injuries. Until a true healer has seen him... I am only basing my judgements on scientific principles I learned as a child. Science and medicine cross over, but they are not interchangeable.”

He sighed.

“Still, anatomical knowledge and understanding of how spiritual bodies operate does help,” he concluded.

“It reminds me of Souja,” Hirata admitted, and Joumei nodded gravely.

“I’m sure it must,” he agreed softly. “I’m sorry. This scene is... rather likely to bring those memories back further. The office is... not a pretty sight. I’m afraid I balked at it, slightly... it reminded me of the night my family were killed, and Hiko, and everything else. But when I realised this man was alive... I don’t even know his name, Hirata-sama, but when I saw that I might be able to help him, I felt better. Keitarou caused these wounds, even if he used a shinigami as his blade. If I can thwart Keitarou’s actions, then I have done some good... and repaid, even a tiny bit, the debt I owe Seireitei.”

“Keep him as stable as you can,” Hirata looked sombre. “As a Council member, I must go view Anabomi’s office for myself... when Hajime returns with help, I’ll leave it to you to explain what you’ve told me about your attempts at treating him. You may tell them you acted with my authority in this matter — with any luck they won’t be interested in asking your name and rank, not with their patient in such a critical state.”

“Yes, sir. Thank you,” Joumei raised his hand in a blood-stained salute, and Hirata acknowledged it darkly, before turning on his heel and making the short trip along the hall to his former colleague's place of work.

Kikyue had left the door open, and the sight that greeted him as he arrived there almost took his breath away.

"Mind the stray head," As he stepped over the threshold, Kikyue's voice came from by the window. "I never knew Anabomi-taichou was so good with a sword. He always seemed very gentle and polite — I guess you never do know your neighbours entirely, do you?"

"Kikyue, that's hardly appropriate," Hirata began, but Kikyue shrugged.

"I know, but still, it's quite a sight," she said matter-of-factly. "More importantly, though, Otousama, come take a look over here. The bloody bodies got most of our attention last time around — but there's something else going on over here that doesn't make a lot of sense."

"Something else?"

Despite himself, Hirata was confused, and Kikyue nodded, gesturing towards the wall. Picking his way over the fallen bodies of the three unfortunate shinigami, Hirata made his way between the pools of blood and debris to join her, his eyes widening behind his glasses as he realised what she had found.

"A secret compartment?"

"Looks that way. Hidden behind that, is my guess," Kikyue pointed in the direction of a crumpled tapestry, the edges clearly torn away. "The key is still in the door. There's a book and some paper inside, but I haven't touched anything. I decided I probably shouldn't... not when I saw... that."

This time she nudged at something with her toe, and Hirata bent to peer at it, his expression becoming grave.

"A vial of some kind... without a stopper."

"The stopper's by the wall, but it does look like Anabomi-taichou drank something, doesn't it?" Kikyue's eyes were burning with curiosity. "Question is, did that cause him to go on a rampage through his Division, or something else? Because that box has an Urahara crest on it, doesn't it? I'm not au fait with all of them, but I'm sure that's from District Three."

"It is," Hirata's brows knitted together. "It is, but I don't understand why that crest should be here, in a Kuchiki division office, and that vial..."

He stood.

"For now, don't touch anything else. We need help with this, and more witnesses before we act," he reflected. "Our first priority is to see to it that Mikihara and Takaoka's injuries are treated, but then we must pursue this further, and probably, cast a wider net. Much as I'd like us to be able to deal with the whole thing ourselves, there's also the matter of where Keitarou is at this precise moment... and whether he has found any other targets than the unfortunate Captain of the Ninth."

Things were hetting up.

In the devastation of the Eighth's courtyard, Shunsui took a step back for a moment, eying the scene with a growing sense of unease. Despite the fact that the front of his Division now looked like someone had blown up a firework factory outside his front door, the struggle for supremacy had quickly shifted in favour of him and his subordinates, for three determined officers against two possessed interlopers had soon given them the advantage they needed. To begin with, Shunsui had shouldered the bulk of Hakubei's determined kidou onslaught, confident that in their released form, Katen Kyoukotsu's blades were a match for anything the other Captain could fire without him having to use his own shikai abilities. Hakubei at one point had seemed likely to release his zanpakutou, but Shunsui had seen the danger and had lunged forward with a stabbing thrust of Amaki's blade, forcing the other man to abort his release attempt in order to prevent his body being cleaved open from shoulder to hip. Shunsui had no real intention of killing his friend, but nor did he believe he could successfully overpower the man by trying to play it safe. Much as he hated to recall it, his fight against a possessed Juushirou, long ago, in the snows of District Seven had left indellible memories of the dangers of holding back against a manipulated ally, and the consequences for both. His only chance was to somehow render Hakubei unconscious and immobile, but even if he did, he was unsure as to how long he would be able to hold the man. The Kyouraku was under no illusions as to how deep Keitarou's hatred for him ran, the outlaw having once even blown up one of his shinigami puppets by overloading his reiryoku in a desperate attempt to end Shunsui's life. Now it was not just him and a handful of school students in danger, but, potentially, the whole of Seireitei, and he could not afford to be either too lax or too full on. Hakubei's life was as much at stake as his own, and so he had left Kanshi to his subordinates, allowing his full attention to be occupied in distracting and diverting Hakubei's resolute attacks.

Any concerns he had had about Sora's composure had quickly dissipated as she had set to work with Shindou to disarm and disable Kanshi as best they could. Despite the fact Shunsui knew Sora's spiritual ability outstripped Kanshi's, he had fought determinedly and with more stealth and ingenuity than Shunsui had expected of one of Keitarou's puppets. To begin with it had been hard to pin him down. Sora and Shindou had not worked together as Shunsui's right and left hand for so long for nothing, however, and they had not panicked, not even when a well-aimed bolt of Byakurai had shot the shield off Sora's Vice Captain's armband. It had clattered against the cobbles, careening up against the barrier fence, but Sora had not even cast it a second glance. Instead she had simply redoubled her efforts with a yell to Shindou to cover her back and, as a result, within the next five minutes the Tenth Division's second officer had been brought down to the ground. Once he hit the cobbles, Shindou darted forward, sitting firmly on Kanshi's back to prevent him from getting up, and out of the corner of his eye, Shunsui was aware of his Vice Captain neatly trussing her opposite number with a powerful mixture of binding spells which, privately he felt certain would hold in place several rabid bears. With Kanshi down, it was now simply a case of three on one... and Shunsui was confident that between them they would be able to successfully bring Hakubei down without allowing Keitarou to hit the self-destruct.

No, it was not Eighth that made him uneasy. Kaoru was a responsible individual who would keep everyone of lower rank safe and inside, whilst the attacking Tenth officers had not managed to breach the Eighth Division building at all. Scorch-marks might now decorate the walls and courtyard as though a dragon had been let loose to roam around the region, and the Eighth's side of Anabomi's tall marble wall was now riven with chips and cracks and dusted with charcoal, but all in all, nothing had gone out of control. Yet although he ought to be relieved, Shunsui felt sick when he contemplated what all of this meant.

We're fighting. And not just us. I can feel it... sense it... almost taste it on the wind. Something at Ninth, something terrible, then the unmistakable sensation of Hirata's Wind Hawk flying free from it's roost... far too close for my liking, and on the opposite side of the fence to where it ought to be. I know I sensed Hirata's zanpakutou coming from behind that marble wall — and I'm sure not all the cracks in it were created by things this side. Something has happened at Ninth Division... and maybe not just there. If Hirata's fighting... maybe Juu is too. Which means... maybe Keitarou's been there... and Koku...

“Taichou!” A yell from Shindou, jerked him back to attention just in time to duck and deflect a fresh barrage of Soukatsui, twisting his weapon around to send them battering into the marble wall once more. It shuddered slightly, sending fresh cracks through the marble, and Shunsui winced as he realised his hurried swing had caused a good section of the topstone to be blasted into smithereens.

“Are you okay, Shunsui?” Sora materialised at his side, Hotarue clutched in her hand. The weapon had not been released, Sora preferring to rely on her kenjutsu and kidou skills than risk inflicting her weapon’s gravitational abilities on her older brother, but despite the charcoal and sweat that streaked her cheeks and matted her hair, the resolution in her gaze helped Shunsui to make up his mind. He nodded his head, shooting her a rueful smile.

“I was just getting a feel for the wider picture,” he said, flicking Seibara’s blade towards the damaged marble divide. “Things are happening there. Bad things, that we won’t like tallying up and that the Council will hate paying out repair money to fix when we’re done.”

“Hirata’s there,” Sora said simply, and Shunsui nodded.

“He is, and I don’t like that he is,” he admitted. “It means things are moving, more swiftly than I’d like. Listen... how confident are you with fighting Hakubei like this?”

“Fighting him?” Sora’s gaze flitted across the courtyard, to where her brother was picking himself up from the ground, having been felled by a section of Eighth’s damaged gate frame. A glance at it told Shunsui that it had not fallen by accident, but had been hit by a bolt of Shindou’s Kidou, and he pressed his lips together, understanding his Third Seat’s reluctance to face the Captain’s firepower head on.

Sora is equal to Hakubei, but she’s his sister. Tetsuya is not as strong as either of them, but lacks the personal involvement. While I’m here, Hakubei’s intent to kill can’t possibly lessen any. Keitarou will have me on his kill list as sure as any other name. If I am here, I can fight Hakubei — if need be, I can kill Hakubei, but if I were to leave... would he come after me? Would he hurt Sora and Tetsuya?

He glanced at the gate once more, then nodded.

“Yes,” he said out loud. “I need to know your honest opinion, Sora-chan. You’re my Vice Captain and I trust your judgement. If you say you can fight, and will fight, then I believe you. But this isn’t just about Eighth Division, not any more. It’s spreading and it has to be put to rest before lots of people are killed. That's why I'm asking if you think you can handle your brother... you and Tetsuya, of course, without my help."

"Where are you going?" Sora was nothing if not sharp, and she cast him a suspicious glance. "You're the one who said we were here to protect Eighth, and now..."

"Mm," Shunsui eyed her for a moment. "Yes, and I won't lie, it's not what I want to do, either. But the information I received about this attack today... so far seems to be merited. And if that is true, then... other parts of it might be, too. Sora, I have to take a gamble. It's a big gamble, and one I don't know the outcome of, yet. Leaving you and Tetsuya to take down Hakubei safely is only one part of that — and if you say you can't do it, I won't have any choice. I'll have to bring him down myself, through whatever means necessary... because this stage of the fight is a distraction, it's not the main event."

"Meaning what?" Sora tossed her sword from one hand to the other, trying to conceal her agitation, but anxiety glittered in her emerald eyes. "Meaning that Haku-nii and Kanshi were sent to attack us to keep us from going somewhere else? To keep us within the Eighth Division while something else happened somewhere else?"

"No, I'm sure they were sent to kill us — me, at least," Shunsui said grimly. "But keeping people occupied is also a clever smokescreen. Make us fight our own and he can slip among us. Keitarou is here, Sora. I'm certain of it... he couldn't be manipulating so effectively if he wasn't close at hand. Even if he is now capable of controlling more than one person, I imagine he'd find it hard to do over a longer distance, and I have a feeling it's not just Hakubei and Kanshi he's got his claws into. If I'm right about Ninth..."

He bit his lip, then,

"I have to go try and do something about it," he said at length. "Can you and Tetsuya manage here?"

"Do you promise not to get yourself killed?" Sora raised her weapon, a challenge in her eyes, and Shunsui paused, then nodded.

"I promise to do my best," he said honestly. "I'm not going anywhere to get killed, and I'll be careful."

"But you won't tell me where, or what you intend to do?"

"I can't. Not yet, not till later," Shunsui shook his head. "Well? Can you handle it, on your own?"

Sora's expression became sad, and Shunsui felt a pang of guilt at the emotion he saw there, but the Vice Captain lowered her head.

"You said it. Haku-nii has a haori, but he's not stronger than I am," she said matter-of-factly, and Shunsui knew that at least half of her composure was an act. "Leave it to us, Taichou. Tetsu and I will handle everything here. You can rely on us, so whatever you need to do, go do it. You said you trusted me... so I'll trust you too. I'll trust you to your word — that you won't get killed and you will come back."

"Make sure you're in one piece to greet me," Shunsui patted her lightly on the arm with the fingers of his left hand, before turning his attention to Hakubei's advancing figure. "And keep your concentration. Remember, it's not your brother — and if I don't succeed, it might never be again. Do what you need to do, Sora-chan... whatever it is, I'll take responsibility with Kyouki-sama later, even if you have to lop off some of his fingers to keep him still."

"I'll keep it in mind," Sora's tones were light, but her expression belied her true feelings. She raised her voice. "Tetsu! Taichou's orders — we bring down Haku-nii and sit on him till he comes back. Are you up for it?"

"Whatever you say, Fukutaichou, I'm just warming up!" came Shindou's reassuring reply, and at his salute, Shunsui grinned.

"Good luck, and don't try to be heroes," he said firmly. "Remember what's at stake. I'll see you later."

Before either of them could respond, he slipped into shunpo, pushing through the streams of light and managing to avoid Hakubei's roving gaze as he sped out into the heart of Seireitei. All around him was a morass of spiritual energy, traces of this person, threads of that, but Shunsui did not let himself be distracted by any of them. He could not sense Keitarou, though as he moved, he felt more and more certain the man was there, and furthermore, that he had had control of Anabomi in the same way he had taken over Hakubei's free will. Anabomi is dead, though. I felt the Wind Hawk and I have no doubt about what Hirata decided needed to be done.

Shunsui's lips pressed together in a thin line as he remembered the surge of energy from over the divide.

I didn't see it, but something unthinkable happened over there. I know it was Anabomi, but it felt... like something else, and then with no hesitation, no mistake... Hirata attacked. Unless Sora and Tetsuya can pin Hakubei down, there's a risk of yet another Captain falling — or something worse than that... so I can't hesitate any more. Keitarou sent Hakubei and Kanshi to Eighth to keep me distracted, but it hasn't worked in the way he expected. The only trouble is, whether or not I still have enough time to change things... before we reach the point of no return!

The blade pricked once more against the flesh of Atsushi's neck, followed by the sensation of something soft and wet dribbling down his throat towards the white inner lining of his uniform shihakushou. His gaze still fixed disbelievingly on his longtime neighbour, Atsushi was oblivious to any signals of pain, for his brain was still struggling to process Mareiko's final words. They had been cold, hard and full of resentment, yet in the stony gaze he could now see the thinly veiled tears held back a fierce strength of will, and at the sight of it, his heart began to ache.

So, then. She knew.

He closed his eyes, letting out his breath in a soft rush as tension which had racked his thin frame now flowed out of him. He sank back against the wall of the chamber, and as he opened his eyes once more, there was resignation in his gaze.

He did not speak, and something in his silence seemed to confuse his companion. Had she expected him to deny it? Atsushi's eyes narrowed slightly, trying to read her demeanour, but the eyes had become cold once more, and though she did not push the blade any harder against his throat, nor did she pull it back, either. The point remained there, the needle-sharp tip burrowing lightly into the folds of his skin.

"Nothing to say?" At length she broke the silence, and Atsushi could hear the impatience now lacing her words, cloaking her uncertainty and renewing her resolve. It had not been easy for her to come here, he knew that now. Her body was trembling, ever so slightly, but whether it was from fear, grief or rage, he could not tell. Her heart was closed to him this time, and he could not read her feelings at all.

At his continued silence, Mareiko's lip curled in contempt, and she slid the weapon down, jabbing it against his ribcage.

"You don't even have the courage to admit to it," she murmured, and now Atsushi could hear the anger rising once more in her normally gentle tones. "I've waited a quarter of a century for this, to hear it from your own lips, and yet you can't even bring yourself to speak. Have you any idea what it's put me through, living that long without being able to do anything about it? Living next door to you, seeing you at meetings, dealing with you as though you were my comrade in arms, when instead you were the one who murdered my Captain in cold blood? I couldn't stand it. Didn't want to stand it. But I couldn't fight you. Not on my own. Not with my sword arm damaged and useless. I had to think again. I had to use my brain... something I've always been good at."

Her eyes became slits.

"So much for the warrior Captain of the Eleventh," she added derisively. "So much for the man who preaches discipline, loyalty, obedience to commands. So much for all of that, Minaichi Atsushi. So much for the man who I thought was my friend. I heard Taichou say it — that you were the one who knew him best, and worked with him the most closely. I heard him, that night at camp, only to see you soaked in his blood the very next day, standing over his corpse."

She lifted the sword, a sudden burst of anger flaring in her eyes.

"Talk!" Suddenly her voice was raised. "Say something, dammit, or I'll take your head from your shoulders and deliver it to Yuuichi-dono myself! Admit it! Tell me the truth, for once in your worthless life — admit it!"

Atsushi gazed at his companion for a moment, taking in her agitation and the emotions threatening to bubble through to the surface at any moment, and his heart clenched once more in his chest. Slowly, and very deliberately, he raised his arms, causing her to flinch warily as his fingers passed the hilt of his weapon. He made no attempt to draw Mokizuki from its sheath, however, simply holding his hands above his head where she could see them.

"You came to arrest me, not to kill me," he said softly. "If you kill me here, you'll be the one who's punished. Vigilante justice never really goes away, Mareiko. It catches up with you, sooner or later. It's not something you want to live with."

"To live with?" Mareiko snorted, shaking her head, and sending her long-suffering hairtie flying across the office, her fair, flaxen mane fanning out around her head in a cloud of straw yellow. "When I've lived like this for this long? You have no idea of the agony you put me through, Atsushi-kun. We were friends. Allies. I trusted you. I didn't listen to the things people said — that you were cold, hard, you didn't care... I believed in you. You were kind to me, always fair, and my Captain trusted you, so so did I. Yet all the time..."

She took a breath, composing herself as her voice threatened to crack and break down into tears, and Atsushi could not help but reach out a hand towards her, only to have it slapped away by his companion's damaged right.

"Don't touch me," she hissed, the blade suddenly once more at his throat. "Don't underestimate me, Atsushi-kun. Instead, do as I say. Draw Mokizuki from its sheath, and drop it on the ground between us. I know how fast you are to that weapon... and I want to make sure you really are unarmed."

Atsushi hesitated for a moment, then sighed, lowering his right hand and obediently pulling the weapon from its scabbard. He paused, and Mareiko pricked the sword tip up against his throat again, a warning look in her eyes.

"Drop it," she repeated. "I won't say it again."

Slowly, Atsushi opened the fingers of his hand, allowing the sword to fall onto the hard panel floor. Mokizuki's spirit protested against his senses, but he ignored his weapon's call. Satisfied, Mareiko nodded, drawing her weapon back a bare inch and eying him clinically.

"Good," she remarked. "You remember, don't you? I trained in kenjutsu, just as much as you did. I was a good fighter, once upon a time... until a monster in the Rukon raked through my right arm and rendered me useless in battle. Now that's how you see me — how everyone sees me. I'm the mad scientist who lurks around Twelfth, not really a shinigami, no longer a warrior, not even able to avenge the death of my Captain. But I wasn't going to just live like that. I made up my mind a long time ago that, if it took me forever, I'd take my revenge. I only prayed nobody and nothing else would kill you before I had my chance to confront you and make you confess. I locked myself in my lab. Trained in secret to make my left hand as strong and as able as my right. Studied kidou to the highest possible level... developed contingency plans, and reached beyond the barriers of Seireitei, all because one day I knew I'd face you, and fight you, and bring justice to my Captain. To hell with Seireitei, to hell with the Gotei. By the time I was recovered enough to talk about it, the matter of Taichou's death had been buried and nobody wanted to talk about it any more, let alone judge it as the brutal, backstabbing murder it really was. They wouldn't help me... so I had to think on other lines. I didn't care what happened to me, or anyone else... my life and everything I believed in died in the Rukon, with my Captain and my ability to fight back. The only thing that kept me going was the fact I knew Taichou was murdered. I decided to live, to keep quiet, and take the haori I didn't want... so long as I got to bring you the justice you'd escaped, I didn't care what lengths I had to go to to achieve it or how long it took. Despite all of that, though, you aren't even man enough to admit to your own heinous crimes. But I know. I know, Atsushi-kun. I know because I saw it. I saw what you did... so don't think you can lie."

This last revelation struck through Atsushi like a knife to the heart, and he bit his lip, his gaze running over his fellow Captain with a sense of grief and regret. Yes, Mareiko had been a warrior. Yes, they had fought together, worked together, and he had been fond of her. He had missed their friendship, over the past quarter of a century, but he had thought to sever it for her own sake, rather than for his. Now, though, he understood. It had been in vain, and yet... at least... in one respect... it had not. She knew... and yet... there was so much she did not.

And it's all right that way. She can hate me. Let her hate me. Let her sate her anger that way and be content... it's no more than I deserve, anyway.

He sighed.

"I'm not going to lie," he said softly. "It's the truth. I killed your Captain. My Vice Captain, too. I killed both of them and returned here alive, concealed it and let Seireitei bury them in ignorance of my actions."

He offered her a sad smile.

"Justice comes, eventually," he said, a mixture of resignation and peace beginning to stir through his heart. "Whatever burdens you think you've lived with, they're nothing compared to mine. Kill me, if it makes you happy. I won't fight you, so do with me as you will."

It was a long way to the Third Division's barracks without the use of Shunpo, and at many points, Kohaku had faltered, unsure that he had the physical strength in his body to make it all the way. Keitarou had left him at the archive at the same time Hirata had begun to battle the Hollowfied form of the Ninth's unfortunate Captain, for the shifts in spirit power had distracted the outlaw from his reunion with his son. He had disappeared in a flurry of spirit power to survey his surroundings from the roof before vanishing from the boy's immediate line of sight, and Kohaku had not tried to follow him. Though he could sense his father's reiatsu, moving away from the archives, he knew that Keitarou's instructions were absolute, and that he should not try to linger when there was so much to be done. That much was out of his hands now... he could only do what he was meant to do.

He paused to lean against the outer wall of the division, putting a hand to his head as the world swayed and tilted around him.

He couldn't pass out here. There was no time for rest, and no time to falter. Keitarou had gone in the direction of Eighth and Ninth after murmuring something about the flurry of the Wind Hawk sword. Kohaku knew this weapon was in the possession of his blood uncle, the older brother of his mother and the father of the ill-fated Souja, but a man Kohaku himself had never met. Keitarou was unlikely to try and fight Hirata whilst the man's sword was released and his temper flying, but nonetheless his sense of curiosity had drawn him closer to the scene. He had not put it into words, but Kohaku had understood that the individual he had been controlling at Ninth had become more unruly and difficult to manage, and that Keitarou had needed to be physically closer in order to reassert any kind of firm manipulation over the fight. It was a distraction, a ripple in the master plan, but Keitarou had been unwilling to relinquish this opportunity to kill Hirata, who had threatened not only his life but that of Eiraki and the unborn Katsura so many years before. He had always been quick to react to circumstances, choosing to use his puppet, not his own blade in a fight to the death, but though he had already known the fight would end in failure, Kohaku had not tried to prevent Keitarou from going. Instead, he had begun his own journey without a word, heading towards the Third Division with determined, focused steps. Keitarou too would come here once he realised his goal was a futile one, probably sooner, rather than later, and given his father's ability with shunpo, there was no time for Kohaku to delay.

Third was big and its barracks old, built and modified from former Clan apartments into an institution which was part military accommodation, part science facility. It was clean and well laid out, and several positions across the yard were clearly guard posts, where, during a normal day, someone would be rostered into sentry duty. Today was different, though. Third were not in situ, the entirety of the Division having left for the Real World some days earlier, and Kohaku was able to cross the threshold unchallenged, gazing around him at what he saw as he padded across the cobbles towards the main building. They had clearly not anticipated any risk of attack in their absence, he mused pensively, for no security procedures had been put in place. But no, surely that was illogical. These were his Father's kin, the people who had adjudged and executed his grandfather, but born of the same cautious, intelligent bloodline as Keitarou himself had been. They could not be so naive as to leave their land unprotected? For a moment he wondered if it were a trap, but a quick sweep of the area told him that his initial assumptions had been correct, and the Third Division barracks were entirely deserted.

His eyes narrowed as he contemplated this.

Another Division's officers should surely be on duty here? The entire Third is missing, yet no other Urahara are here to guard the place in their absence? I don't know enough about the Divisions to work out what that means or why, but even an interloper like me realises that military officers wouldn't leave their barracks completely undefended. There should be people here, but there are not. Is this your work, Father? Did you deal with the people you consider the devil, and bribe an Urahara to leave this place empty? Is an Urahara your Gotei spy? But if that's the case, what kind of Clan are we dealing with? You were exiled by them, Grandfather was condemned... the foxes were also put out by Urahara law. Now, an Urahara within the Gotei itself is potentially choosing your alliance rather than their own? Whoever leads here clearly has no idea the treason is so close to home. They've left this place in trust and assurance that someone would be looking to protect it... but this place Father needs, so he would have taken steps to keep it unguarded. The spy must be someone with Urahara connections, since only an Urahara would have the power to give those orders. That doesn't tell me any more than what I knew before, though, and nor does it change my plan of action in the slightest. I don't know any of these Urahara. Not a single one.

Despite his heritage, Kohaku knew little of his father's blood family. He knew the story of his grandfather, Keitsune, as told by his bitter father, but little else over the long years of his confinement. He had not thought to ask, either, nor sought to draw the memories forth on his own, so it was with a sense of irony that he gazed up at the tall, imposing building, realising that it had been put together by his ancestors and was governed by men who were, technically, his kin, yet about whom he knew almost nothing.

Are you going to stand here and admire the view, or are you going to do what you came here to do?

Kyouka's voice broke his reverie, destroying his moment of curiosity with the harsh reminder of the reasons for his coming. He frowned, his gaze drawn momentarily to the misshapen sword that hung at his waist, but he did not respond to Kyouka's impatient question, simply beginning once more to plod, methodically and resolutely, towards his target. Though he had never been here before, the route was mapped out in his mind as though he had trodden it many times before, and so he did not hesitate, weaving his way around the accommodation blocks towards his final destination. Like the barracks, it too lay unguarded, and Kohaku was able to take his time in assessing what stood before him.

Third Division's Senkaimon was bigger and more finely constructed than anything Kohaku had ever seen before. The only Gate he had ever travelled through himself had been the one opened by Souja's sword on the ill-fated trip back from Rukongai, and at that time, Kikyue's attack had come so swiftly he had had little time to register his surroundings. Even so, though, he remembered that that Gate had been little more than a black hole yawning itself open within the Rukon atmosphere. By contrast, here, the phenomenon was surrounded by a big, carefully constructed frame that, though closed, still glittered and hummed with the spiritual energy of its activation. Kohaku circled it a couple of times, but he was no scientist, and no matter how he looked at it, he could not fathom how it worked. Souja had thrust his zanpakutou into nothing and created a door, but though this almost certainly worked on the same principles, the surrounding controls and dials made it appear much more complex. Senkaimon had been his grandfather's science, Keitarou had told him that with some pride, and Keitarou himself had done much to bring the technology forward. Gotei Senkaimon, Kohaku knew, were all based on notes — either borrowed or stolen — from one of Keitarou's own laboratories in District Seven, and Kohaku felt sure that, if his father were here, he would know exactly how to operate the Gate without a moment of hesitation.

But I haven't come here to operate the Gate, and nor will Father. I've come here to destroy it, in order to make sure nobody can get back here too soon and change the flow of battle.

Kohaku cast the structure one last, slightly apologetic glance, taking in the finely polished frame and understanding how much care and attention had clearly gone into maintaining it. He curled his hand around the Sekkiseki coated hilt of his sword, pulling it clumsily from its place at his side and gazing at the murky, ill-fitting blade with a mixture of resignation and loathing. Then, very carefully, he took a step closer to the Gate's controls, swinging the weapon around and plunging the thick blade deep into the mechanics. There were sparks and flickers of spiritual energy, as the Senkaimon's technology objected to his vandalism, but despite the static now pricking at his aura, Kohaku did not hesitate. Instead he closed his eyes, allowing the barriers of his spirit power to flow free and wild through the hilt of the sword. As the reiryoku within his body collided once more with that sealed in the misshapen weapon, the Sekkiseki around the hilt began to melt away, running along the surface of the blade and dripping in globules onto the ground and into the heart of the Third Division's Gate. The heat burned his hands, but Kohaku did not even notice the pain, for a far stronger, more ferocious flame had seared its way through the inside of his body. It surged ruthlessly through tissue and bone and into his bloodstream, pumping its way through his racing heart. Kohaku could no longer see his surroundings, nor sense anything about them, for the world in his head had become far too vivid, too intense for him to register its unreality. Everything inside his mind was sent scattering, his thought processes overwhelmed by the force of the images. Somewhere in the distance was the sound of warping, twisting frames and exploding components, followed by a fizz and sizzle of shredded reiryoku, as the force of the spiritual energy Kohaku was emitting proved too much for the delicate structure of the Senkai Gate's frame. The young boy did not even react, the memory of his intention to destroy the Gate's activation field long since shattered.

And then, from the morass of light and colour, one image rushed into focus. He saw a silhouetted form, white haori flapping against his shoulders, and two scimitar shaped zanpakutou blades drawn and poised, waiting to strike. The image had been fleeting, no more than a split-second of consciousness in amongst thousands upon thousands of other thoughts and images, and Kohaku had not managed to see the man's face. Still, he clung onto it, making it his anchor and slowly, using it to bring coherent thought back to the forefront of his mind. He screwed up his eyes, struggling to maintain that control.

Kyouraku-dono, I'm sorry for everything I've done and all the trouble I've caused you and Ukitake-dono. Probably its trouble I'm continuing to cause you, even now. I'm sorry for everything I said to you the other day, and I'm sorry for asking of you such unforgivable, unthinkable things. If you don't forgive me, then it's all right. Probably I won't be here to see the result of this, anyway. I've never unleashed my power like this before, and I'm not sure what will happen when I'm done. But even if that's true, please, don't give up. Please make sure Ukitake-dono is all right... and Kirio-san and Edogawa-san, too. I don't want them to be hurt because they were kind to me.

With that he redoubled his focus on the sword of the blade, gasping as the pain became more and more intense. The images were whirling around him once more, swimming and swirling too fast to carry any particular meaning. Light glinted off them, making it seem as though they were being reflected towards him in the surface of a mirror, and then, as the pain drove him to his knees, the colours began to clear once more, opening up one particular scene and pushing it firmly to the forefront of his mind.

It was raining. Raining in Rukongai, and a shinigami in a white haori was fighting Hollow-men.

Tears streamed down Kohaku's cheeks, tears of terror, pain and of grief, but he did not let go.

I don't even know if this is right, or if betrayal is enough of a fear to make a difference, but it's all I have. It's all I have to show them... so I'll show them... that day in the Rukon and hope for the best.

Author's Note: Additional Chapter!

Yes, two chapters this week — because the next one goes with this one, and makes more sense that way... happy reading ;)

65. Interlude: Rukongai, 25 Years Earlier

Interlude: Rukongai Twenty Five Years Earlier

The rain was slick against his skin, beating down through the thick, heavy fabric of his clothing and making it stick to his body as it continued to fall relentlessly from a dark, overcast sky. It had never rained in Rukongai before, not during a single one of their patrols, yet on that day the sky had chosen to unleash its load on the unsuspecting shinigami, turning the dry, dusty ground into a muddy marshland. This was not life-giving rain, but dark, grey droplets of spirit-polluted, Sekkiseki tainted liquid that would do nothing to nourish the feeble strands of grass that struggled through the earth, bending and twisting upwards in a futile search for light. It was yet another of the grim realities of a world savaged by spiritual disharmony — the unhappy cause, so Seireitei believed, of the mutations in Rukongai.

Believed, but not by everyone.

Atsushi shook the blood and debris from his sword, distaste crossing his thin features as he gazed down at the crumpled body of one of the tormented creatures. Twisted and broken, its entire upper body had been warped into something better resembling a shell, the head sunken in at the neck and covered even now from brow to chin in a white, chalky substance. It was the fifth creature he had killed since they had arrived here, though unlike the others, this one had not dissipated immediately into dust. Perhaps it had still retained its consciousness — Atsushi could not tell, for its tongue, large and swollen, had lolled out of its mouth, making it impossible for it to form any coherent words.

The Eleventh Division Captain sighed, pushing his rain-soaked hair back from his face in frustration. There was no end to the fighting, no end to the slaughter, and the subsequent reports to Seireitei of yet more souls mutated beyond recognition. The rain continued to fall, washing the blood from the zanpakutou blade, but Atsushi paid it little mind, turning to survey the field around him. His eyes narrowed as he counted up the damage. Three, no, perhaps four down in this raid. Further over the rise, he could make out his adjutant, almost silhouetted in the gloom, and he pursed his lips.

“Ikata! Yamaguchi! Furizaki!” He raised his voice, shaking the water and blood from his blade and gesturing to the three officers of rank within his hearing. "This area is clear. Proceed to the next. I'm heading to meet up with Sakanoue and we'll continue south from there. Remember, no prisoners. They're all to be destroyed, irrespective of their level of mutation. Try not to trip over the Twelfth's operations — Sekime-fukutaichou and her team ought to be clearing up the east, so take the western path. We'll meet you back at the Senkaimon, when you're done."

"Yes, sir!" The three men saluted, disappearing into shunpo, and Atsushi stepped over the body at his feet, making his way over the rise towards the place where his Vice Captain stood.

Sakanoue was standing over the corpse of another fallen individual, breathing heavily, and as Atsushi approached, he realised with a jolt that something was wrong. Though the body on the ground was still and bloody, just as the one he had dispatched himself had been, there were no signs of mutation, no deformed twisting of limbs nor residual chalky matter marring her face. She was a woman in middle age, her expression one of sightless terror, and at Atsushi's approach, Sakanoue glanced up, a strange, half-wild, half-desperate look in his eyes as he turned to face his Captain.

"Taichou... I... I don't..."

Atsushi frowned, moving to stand at the side of the body.

"Was she about to turn?" he asked softly, and there was no answer. Instead, Sakanoue drew a deep, shaky breath into his lungs.

"Heiji?" Atsushi's voice had a sharp edge to it, a tone that he used when he expected immediate obedience. "I asked a question. Answer it, please."

"I don't know what happened," at length the Vice Captain spoke, and Atsushi could hear the distress in his voice. "For a minute, everything was blurred and there were six, seven of them coming at me, yelling and waving and screeching their war cries. And then... there was my blade going through flesh, and I... I saw her, lying there. Did I kill her? I didn't see her, but Taichou..."

He faltered, raising his free hand to rub his rain-drenched brow in agitation, and Atsushi frowned, glancing around him.

There were no other bodies within the reach of Sakanoue's sword, just that of the woman.

"You saw... six or seven?" He asked quietly. Sakanoue nodded, his breathing once more ragged and uneven, as though he was struggling to even draw breath into his lungs.

“Taichou, I think something’s wrong with me,” he said unevenly. “I thought it... when we arrived, but I... didn’t... I wasn’t sure. I think... something...”

He put a hand to his throat, grimacing, and Atsushi’s eyes widened in dismay.

“Heiji? Tell me. Tell me now, right away. Did you accept anything from him? Did you accept anything from that man, anything at all?”

Another long silence, then Sakanoue shrugged.

“It was just water,” he murmured. “He was drinking it too, so I thought... he wouldn’t... not to himself. But... perhaps... I was...”

That was as far as he got, his words blurring together into a twisted yowl as he suddenly sank to the ground, clutching his head in his hands.

“Heiji!” Tension coursing through Atsushi’s body, the Captain hurried to his companion’s side, but Sakanoue thrust out a desperate arm, raising frightened eyes to his companion.

“Taichou... please,” he gasped. “I... I don’t... think I can...”

Whatever else he had been about to say was choked and garbled in his throat once more, as a thick, whiteish substance began to pour from the young man’s mouth and eyes, his body twitching in clear agony as he fought in vain against the inevitable. His heart almost dead in his chest, Atsushi watched, numb with horror as the adjutant he had trained from when he was a small boy began to transform into a monster right before his gaze.

There was nothing he could do to stop it, and the orders he had given his other officers now resurfaced cruelly in the back of his mind.

All to be destroyed. No prisoners.

Atsushi’s grip tightened around his sword, distress in his gaze, but there was no time for hesitation. With a bloodcurdling shriek, the creature that had been his Vice Captain launched his body at his companion, blade clutched in his hands and a mad gleam in his glittering eyes. There was nothing of the eager, loyal young man in that expression, just the lust and anticipation of a kill sunk deep beneath the layers of chalky white. The rain continued to beat down, and Atsushi’s feet slipped against the slick surface as he fought to defend his body from this sudden, ruthless attack. They were red eyes, bulging and deformed from a face that now exuded the white chalk from each and every pore, leaving nothing of his adjutant's features visible.

"Stop this!" Atsushi cried out in vain, pushing wet hair back from his face with his left hand, whilst parrying the weak, drunken shot with the sword in his right. It jerked and twisted against the hand too clumsy to hold it, falling with a soft thud onto the muddy ground, yet the wielder paid it no mind. Instead another ungodly screech emitted from beneath the bare white surface of what had now hardened into a mask, pocked and uneven as it tried to harden under the relentless assault of the rain. The blood on the enemy's clothes and arms seemed in complete contrast to the sudden waxiness of his skin, and he launched his body forward, arms outstretched, yearning for the kill. His fingernails scraped against the white fabric of his opponent's haori, leaving bloody prints across the sodden cloth.

The shinigami's blade swung down, almost by instinct rather than by design. With a single sweep it sliced through the corner of the mask, sending cracks through every corner of it and causing bits to fragment and break away. Pale lips became visible, moving with difficulty as though fighting against some unknown force. There was a moment of restraint, as the crimson eyes dulled, and through those chapped, colourless lips came words.

"Help... me."

The tones were hoarse and strained, each syllable squeezed through vocal chords which were no longer responsive to their owner's instructions. In the pall of fighting, a clubbed hand reached out, in desperation, towards the other's blade, and despite himself Atsushi took a step back, no longer wondering if it was rain or tears that saturated his lashes.

"Heiji," he murmured, and at the sound of his name, the creature's body lurched up, true agony in the crimson eyes. For a moment they met gazes, then another blood-curdling shriek broke forth from the pale lips, and the moment of sanity was broken. As the toxic level of reiatsu whipped around them both, a mixture of rage and then despair thudded over Atsushi's body.

Help me.

The enemy's words resonated against his senses, over and over, in time with the beat of the rain. As he raised his sword, defending himself from a clawed swipe with only just enough conviction to push the attacker away, he understood what his companion had truly been asking for.

He glanced at his sword, and a ripple of regret washed through its spirit in answer to his question. Was it the overcast sky reflecting on its surface, or had the silver of the blade dulled slightly, as though going into mourning for an ally well loved?

Summoning his resolve, Atsushi hardened his heart, forcing himself to see only a beast before him, lurching and in pain. It was a Hollow. It was his enemy. To kill it was his duty. It must end now. He had said it himself. No prisoners. All to be destroyed.

The blade came down in a decisive arc this time, sweeping through shell and bone to the soft tissue beneath, and in the cascading spray of blood, there was a bloodcurdling scream of pain and despair as the creature fell to the ground. It writhed and moaned against the mud for a moment, but Atsushi did not hesitate, striking cleanly through the jugular. The moans became gurgles, bubbles forming against the pale lips, then the body lay still. Bit by bit the shell coating began to fall away from the hands and arms, revealing the silent form of his adjutant, Sakanoue Heiji, lying crumpled on the ground.

Discarding the weapon as though it were made of burning metal, Atsushi cradled the broken body desperately in his arms, searching in vain for the signs of life he knew were no longer there. Even the final, gurgling rattle in the man's throat had dissipated into silence. A dull hush fell over the scene, broken only by the splashing drops of the rain which was beginning at last to abate.

Slowly and painstakingly, Atsushi broke the remainder of the mask that still covered the upper part of his protege's face, gently smoothing the flakes of white away from his Vice Captain's skin. The eyes were still open, but no longer that gleaming red and, with a heavy heart, Atsushi closed them, gazing for a moment at the body with hate and grief surging through his veins.

"I won't forgive you," he muttered, reaching for the bloodstained sword with renewed resolve as he got to his feet, swinging around in search of his target. "I won't forgive you for this, Kusakawa!"

His final words had erupted into the heavy, damp atmosphere, a scream of anger and revenge as his emotions got the better of him, rushing through his body and ruling both his heart and his head.

"I know you're there!" he exclaimed, the hilt of the weapon heavy in his hand as he scoured the landscape, a hunter searching for his prey. "I know you're listening, watching every single second of this! I can damn well sense your reiatsu, so show yourself and answer for what you've done! If you think I'll walk away and forgive this,

Kusakawa, you're wrong!"

"Forgive me?" As if blown away by the wind, a blur and distortion in the atmosphere told Atsushi that his instinct had been right, and that the target of his hatred had indeed been watching from behind the convenience of a concealing kidou spell. "Forgive me for what, Atsushi-dono? For witnessing you cut the throat of your Vice Captain? For not being able to stop you in time? For what do I require forgiveness? There is only one sword stained with blood here, and believe me, it isn't mine."

He put a hand to his scabbard, drawing forth his own silver weapon and turning it so the light could catch the shining blade. There was something too immaculate about his appearance, and Atsushi's anger flared up yet again as he gazed at his companion from head to foot, realising that despite the lives already lost and the battles going on across large swathes of the affected area, this man had made no attempt to even lift a finger to help. On the contrary, there was a look of interested amusement in his pale eyes, but the smile on his lips lacked all the warmth it usually held, and every word, though light and apparently unconcerned, held a hardness that Atsushi had never heard there before.

His heart lurched then clenched once more with anger.

It was one thing to have suspicions, but yet another to see them brought to life. The man now standing before him was unrepentant, gloating as he watched shinigami die.

"You won't be forgiven for this," Atsushi spoke in low tones. "You shouldn't have done this, Kusakawa. I mean it. You'll regret it — if it takes the last breath in my body, I will carve that regret into you myself! I will make sure you answer to this before Seireitei, so help me — I won't let you play with, torment and slaughter any more of my officers."

"Slaughter?" The pale eyes widened in an affectation of surprise, though that cold smile spread further at Atsushi's words. "You seem confused. I have not killed a shinigami today, and Sakanoue-kun doesn't seem to be in any position to offer you absolution. I had thought he was a favourite of yours... but perhaps I was wrong."

He stepped neatly over the dip in the land, skirting around the range of Atsushi's drawn weapon until he came to stand at Sakanoue's side. He bent down, reaching out a long pale finger to touch the man's cheek, then sighed, tut-tutting under his breath.

"A failure in all respects, apparently," he reflected, and though his comments were only half to himself, the other half Atsushi knew were meant to jibe at him. His expression darkened, but he kept a rein on his spirit power, instead forcing a single word to drop from his lips.

“Why?”

“Why?” The other man glanced up, looking surprised. “Why what? You’ll have to be more explicit, Atsushi-dono. I’m afraid I don’t understand.”

Atsushi took a step forward, jabbing his sword angrily at the white haori that cloaked the other man’s shoulders, and the fair haired individual clicked his tongue disapprovingly, taking a step back to avoid being touched by the still bloody blade.

“Careful. This is still clean, and I’d like it to remain that way,” he chided lightly. “Blood is difficult to remove from white cloth — well, given the Eleventh’s reputation, maybe you don’t care about that. Certainly, to look at you now, one would think you preferred your uniform dyed deep with the stuff.”

He sighed, shrugging his shoulders in weary fashion, and Atsushi gritted his teeth at the mocking air in his companion’s aura.

“Well, that’s a combat division for you,” the other man continued. “Savages fighting with no real rhyme or reason behind why. An order is given and they follow it — that’s all. No better than trained monkeys — that’s how my father used to describe your Clan, and apparently, he was right.”

He glanced at Sakanoue once again, then,

“I had high hopes for his ability to withstand it,” he admitted. “I thought a target of higher reiatsu might retain some vestiges of sanity, but it seems I overestimated your skill in training him. He was a capable yes-man, and he mutated beautifully, but he wasn’t enough to be able to kill you. I suppose that means I need to do it myself — which is such a bother, but I don’t see what else I can do.”

“You killed my adjutant,” Atsushi’s voice shook. “You killed him and who knows how many other people. But you’re not as clever as you think you are. I knew. Sakanoue and I, we both knew. We played along with you to learn as much as we could, that’s all. Sakanoue knew who really killed him, even if it was my blade that severed his life. He knew, and so do I. I won’t let him die unanswered. I’ll arrest you and take you back to Seireitei, so everyone there can see your true colours, Kusakawa Shougo!”

“True colours,” Shougo’s lips thinned into an unpleasant smile, all levity gone from his voice and his expression now. “Did you think you could bring me here and use the space and anonymity of the Rukon to snare me? You are as much of an idiot now as you were the first time we began working together. The only reason I tolerated it as long as this was because Eleventh Division are notorious for knowing nothing about anything until it jumps up and slaps them in the face. Genryuusai-dono’s lackeys, servants of a family whose head is not even its most powerful or influential member, taking orders and obeying them without questioning their worth. Because it was you, I knew I could operate on my own aims. The fact it’s taken you this long to reason it out is just further proof.”

The cold smile widened.

“I said, not so long ago, that you were the person I worked with the closest, the one who knew me the best. Perhaps even a friend — certainly an ally and a comrade in arms,” he said disparagingly. “Those words were true, up to a point. You are now the one who knows me best, Atsushi-dono. Even better than Seizuku, with whom I trained as a young man, and with whom I shared so many hopes and dreams.”

“Is Anabomi part of this too?” Fury radiated from every one of Atsushi’s words, and Shougo tut-tutted, shaking his head in amusement.

“Seizuku is a proud Kuchiki,” he chided. “Do you think he’d have sanctioned me experimenting on members of other squads to further my scientific progress? People of Clan birth? Don’t be foolish. He would never have allowed anything like that to taint his perfect view of an ordered, settled world. He is my friend, and because he is my friend, I spared him from the unpleasantness. Perhaps he knew I worked on reiryoku enhancements. Maybe he understood that sometimes, I did field work here, in the Rukon. He knew I hunted the exile, Keitarou, as all good shinigami ought to do — maybe I discussed with him once, after Shouichi-sama’s death, the possibility that it was Chudokuga who slew my father and put a stop to his scientific research. But experimenting like this? Of course not. It wouldn’t suit his delicate, refined palette to consider something like this as progress. Even now I doubt he understood the first thing about my scientific forays, and I prefer that it’s that way. He never was perceptive enough to make all the necessary connections, and I don’t need to taint him or our long alliance with stories of mutated Vice Captains lying broken on the ground. He never knew what Father’s chief area of research was, — nor that it became mine. He didn’t realise that, when I spoke of creating my own division and making Twelfth stand apart from the Clan, I meant to remove it by force and kill any people in my path. It was easy, though. Seizuku is a Kuchiki, and because of that it's easy to convince him that all the bad things that happened here happened because of Keitarou. I hate the exile, and I want to kill him — but while he still lives, I can use his reputation as a smokescreen for my own work. Nagesu-sama would never look to me for treason, not when he has such a juicy prize in his sights.”

“You were the one who told the Captains that you felt Keitarou wasn’t responsible in the Rukon!” Atsushi spat out, and Shougo let out a peal of amused laughter.

“Of course I did,” he said condescendingly. “What else would I do? Did you never hear of misdirection, Minaichi? This is not Keitarou’s work, so I told them it wasn’t, but even though I did, it will be believed that it is. Maybe because of it, after this trip, this time, all of it will be blamed on him. My scientific theories on the subject will be discredited by the huge spillage of Gotei blood. Who but Keitarou hates the Gotei and the Clans enough to do this kind of damage? Who else experiments with turning people into Hollows? Of course they will consider it Keitarou’s doing. Because they will, nobody will ever make the connection between me and what occurred here. They will dismiss my errors and continue to underestimate me — until it is too late and everything I have worked towards is complete.”

He looked thoughtful.

“But... perhaps that is too deep a level of planning for you to fully comprehend. Your expression seems to doubt me — I’m sorry, I’d forgotten that your intelligence was so distinctly inferior to my own.”

He prodded at Sakanoue’s corpse with his weapon, then,

“Ultimately, it seems you and I have become closer than even Seizuku could ever boast. How does it feel to know your suspicions have been proven right?”

“I don’t see other Captains as friends,” Atsushi said stiffly, swinging his own blade angrily against Shougo’s and forcing it away from his former adjutant’s body. “I don’t consider the Gotei a social club. When someone is taking souls and turning them Hollow, that’s a reason for investigation. When that person is a fellow Captain, it’s a cause for grief. Anabomi might be a fool, but if he’s only guilty of being fooled by you, at least his hands aren’t stained with blood. That means that I need to round you up, as I initially planned, and this business will be over. Sakanoue will be avenged and there will be no more horror in the Rukon. You’re wrong, too. I wasn’t fooled for as long as you think.

I might be acting now, but I have known for some time. The other Captains might be fooled with Aizen as a smokescreen, but I've been here, I've seen how things are, and I know that the dates and times do not add up with his known movements in District Six. That was what first told me that the enemy was closer to home, in the labs and lair of someone just as arrogant and far more deluded than the one the Council have their heart set on hunting. But you can't just accuse another Captain on a whim. Not one who's smart, and capable of flying the coop and taking shelter in Third District. Inner Seireitei still lacks a firm base for Gotei authority, which meant proceeding in such a way that you wouldn't be alerted to my investigation too soon. You're a Clansman, a landholder and a man of influence within the Urahara. I needed firm, positive proof first, so Sakanoue and I began gathering evidence, biding our time. I could've outed you in Seireitei, but it would've been messy, difficult. So it had to happen here."

His thin features twisted into a scowl.

"I just want to know why," he concluded. "Why you betrayed your Clan, your division, your people. Why you betrayed Sakanoue and I. Why you betrayed Mareiko. Why all of those things. Before I take you into custody, I want to hear your story from your own lips."

"Why would you care to do that?" Kusakawa looked startled, then he let out another peal of amused laughter. "Oh, I see. Because of Mareiko. This has all been about Mareiko, hasn't it? You didn't confront me in Seireitei, not because you feared my position in the Urahara and a backlash against the Yamamoto because of it, but because you didn't know how much she knew, or how much she might be involved in all of this. And here, here too, you hesitated thus far because she was with me. Your weakness has always been Mareiko."

His expression became derisive.

"In a normal person, such reactions might be interpreted as partiality. If you weren't such a neanderthal with a mind fit for nothing but fighting, one might even suggest it was love."

Atsushi flushed red with indignation, struck speechless by the temerity of Kusakawa's words, and the Urahara Captain shrugged.

"Why are you glaring? What I say is true. Among normal people, such fondness might even be cause for courtship — your rank and hers would suit both Clans quite well. That is, providing Mareiko's family hadn't met you... but such things are quite academic now. I'm sorry to break it to you, but I won't be giving you consent to court my Vice Captain. Well, probably you'd thank me for that judgement..."

given your narrow, archaic views.”

He lowered his voice, eyes glittering with malice.

“But I will tell you the answer to your unspoken question. Mareiko was chosen as my adjutant for several reasons. Reasons that relate to the Urahara’s deepest secrets, and a rationale you would never understand. Father saw potential in her when she was just a child, and his expectations were borne out — she truly is a gifted young woman with very special skills. Ultimately, though, she worked so well as my second in command because I knew she would never see beyond her own science to the depths of mine. She’s a talented individual. Intelligent, too. Genius, some might say — I wouldn’t argue with them. Certainly several levels above your own poor intellect. I knew I could use her effectively, and, thanks to her unique position with regards to the Clan, I could count on her loyalty more than that of anyone else. But with people of that ilk, Atsushi-dono, it’s easy to just let them slip into their own world. With that level of genius comes naivety and blind trust — well, you must know that. The fact she considers you her friend when all others sheer away from you is evidence enough. People like Mareiko may be brilliant, but myopic. They see the things they want to see, and nothing else. I helped her with her research, and so she never asked about all of mine. She was never involved with this. That’s why I brought her here with me when I knew things would come to a head today. It was unfortunate, but events forced my hand. That friendship between the two of you was beginning to be problematic anyway... so I decided to cut my losses and move on.”

His eyes glittered.

“I intended to test run something I’d been working on here, on all of you,” he said matter of factly. “On Mareiko, on you, on Sakanoue. You don’t think I didn’t realise your suspicions? I planned a welcome in your honour, for finally managing to string the clues together and find the truth. And I made sure everyone was present, including an appropriate damsel in distress.”

“What have you done with her?” Atsushi was suddenly alarmed, and Shougo chuckled, shaking his head.

“Nothing, yet,” he said dismissively. “She’s unconscious, but that’s all. One of my creations severed a ligament in her shoulder, most likely. I’ll finish her off when we’re done here. You can consider that part of it your fault, Atushi-dono — she was your lure, but to make her so, I had to be willing to sacrifice her. It was a very hard decision to make — Vice Captains are difficult to come by, especially good ones. Oh, but I suppose you know that. Didn't you train Sakanoue from infancy? Then you'll understand the sacrifice I made to play you at your own game."

He shrugged his shoulders.

"I'll make it all worthwhile, though. I'll paint the scene of carnage beautifully," he taunted. "I'll return to Seireitei, report how I fought bravely to defend you all but without success. They'll give you a hero's funeral, Atsushi-kun — won't that be nice? You can smoulder on the Clan barbeque while your family observe the proper mourning. Of course, they probably won't miss you very much — you don't seem to be very liked by them. But I'm sure they'll turn out for show all the same. That's what Clans are for, aren't they? For show."

"You're as Clan as I am," Atsushi snapped, and Shougo nodded.

"I am," he agreed. "You already commented on my Clan rank, and it's truer than you think. My father was a very trusted aide and servant of Rikaya-sama, did you know that? A survivor from before the scandal of Keitarou's father Keitsune and the subsequent disgrace of that line. Father benefited from that, all of it, and as a result my family have been at the heart of the Urahara administration for longer than Nagesu-sama has even been alive. I've been in his service for most of my life. For that reason, I was recommended above others of higher rank for the Captaincy of Twelfth. I, my father, we had impeccable reputations. Who better to appoint than me?"

He sighed pensively.

"My father was a brilliant man, and did many interesting experiments, but he died — or was murdered — far too young to bring them all to fruition. Lucky for me he left behind copious notes. A scientist always explores every avenue of investigation, whether it be palatable or even morally correct to do so. This you see here," he gestured to their surrounds and the bloodsoaked remains of the other fallen members of the Eleventh and Twelfth divisions, "is the culmination of my work but also of his. I'm getting so very much closer now to perfecting the technique. Sakanoue's final actions were not as I would've liked them, but they showed some conscious thought and I can draw a lot from it. Maybe I can even apply it to Father's projects — who knows?"

"People are just potential experiments to you, aren't they?" Atsushi demanded. Shougo shrugged.

"And to you they're just individuals you give orders to or receive orders from," he returned neatly. "Of all the people in the Gotei, you should understand the utilitarian nature of the masses. You choose to train yours to kill on the battlefield, I choose to train mine chemically, for control of a bigger prize and a bigger picture. What that is doesn't concern you, however. You won't live long enough to see its effects, and I'm tired of talking. At this rate, Seireitei will wonder why we're not answering their spirit pages, and I'd really like to be done and dusted before they send anyone to look for us. It would be a hassle to kill more people with this sword when I'd been saving it especially for you. I felt sure the mutations could speak for most of the danger, but though I gambled with Sakanoue, I did expect that it would take a Captain's sword to take out the Captain of the Eleventh Division. What could be more terrifying for Seireitei than that, though? To think that such monsters had the power to kill a Captain — even though, of course, I will tell them how bravely you fought."

He smiled cruelly.

"If you like, I'll tell them you died avenging Mareiko and Sakanoue," he offered off-handedly. "That way your name will at least get some respect in death, regardless of everything said about you in life."

He glanced at Sakanoue, nudging the man's limp arm with his toe.

"You're already tired," he added. "And I know you and your sword, so I know your weaknesses. Mareiko is unconscious, hurt and bleeding. Sakanoue is dead. Those who remain alive are minnows following trails after ghosts far from this place, so nobody will come to your defence. But then, who would? With Sakanoue dead, who else in the whole of Soul Society cares anything for you, Atsushi-dono? It's foolish to try and fight against the inevitable. You might as well submit and let me kill you with the least possible fuss."

"I have enough strength left in me to fight a dozen more of your hollow drones and still bring you to heel," Atsushi said thickly. "If you doubt that, you underestimate me."

"Or you underestimate me," Shougo said smoothly, raising his sword up before his face and tilting the blade so that the smooth surface glinted light in Atsushi's direction. "Enough playing. I'm bored with you — you've never been a viable specimen, which makes you dispensable."

"And you've never been a viable Captain, which makes arresting you paramount," Atsushi lifted his own weapon, giving it a shake as it glittered with eerie, defiant light. "Kubi o tore, Mokizuki!"

No sooner had the words left his lips than the hilt of the weapon lengthened into a long, carved handle, the blade bending around into the crescent moon curved, razor sharp surface of a reaping scythe.

Shougo gazed at it for a moment, then he snorted.

“If you had used that on Sakanoue, it would’ve been so much quicker,” he reflected. “I’ve heard that Mokizuki can slice a Hollow’s head from it’s shoulders in less than a second. Yet you didn’t think to summon it. You really were soft on that boy, weren’t you?”

“He was my Vice Captain,” Atsushi spoke stiffly. “A Captain’s job is to avenge the death of his officers.”

“So you’ll use that ungainly thing to slice off my head?” Shougo taunted, and Atsushi shrugged.

“I’d rather not cover my sword with your tainted blood,” he returned blackly. “I told you already. It’s Seireitei’s justice you’ll face, not mine. It’s the Council’s execution that you ought to face, not mine. I’m not like you. I’m not a vigilante.”

“Hard to believe from a man who just killed his adjutant,” Shougo taunted, and Atsushi tensed, a grim look crossing his features.

“I killed a Hollow. A Hollow you created,” he said flatly. “I will answer to Seireitei’s justice for that, too, without a doubt. If it stops you from being let loose on any more officers... on Mareiko, and on anyone else, I’ll submit myself to their justice, too. So long as it takes you out of circulation, I won’t keep anything back. That’s my duty — and as you’ve probably noticed, doing my duty is my first priority. That’s why the Yamamoto chose me to Captain this division, above any and all other candidates for the job.”

“Sigh. So boring,” Shougo rolled his eyes, but he raised his own weapon, running his index finger slowly and methodically along the blunt edge of the blade and Atsushi saw a prickle of light spread from hilt to tip, engulfing it entirely in its haze. “A sword fight suits me fine, though. You released first, so that will almost make my killing you an act of self defence. Yo o ogamu, Yachuu Ryoujin.”

He drew the weapon down through the thick damp air, and Atsushi’s eyes narrowed, taking in the hazy, almost spectral form of the weapon as it cut through the atmosphere. Though he had worked and fought alongside Shougo in the Rukon for many years, it was the first time he had seen Yachuu Ryoujin in full release, and glancing at it now, he realised that it was both as eerie and enigmatic as its owner. The blade’s surface was almost see-through, as though it were a ghost blade forged from reiatsu alone. It was a slender weapon without a guard, and even focusing his full attention on it, it was difficult for Atsushi to make out exactly where it tapered to a point.

At his expression, Shougo smiled.

“I’d forgotten. You haven’t seen my zanpakutou released before, have you?” he mused, sweeping it up and across as though testing his swing, but Atsushi felt the rush of energy as the weapon drew towards him and with a curse he leapt back, only just avoiding being slashed across the front of his uniform. “Yes, you see, it’s hard to judge, isn’t it? You never know how close to danger you are when it’s released. Apt, don’t you think — considering how much danger you’ve walked into now. Your scythe won’t be able to cut me down, not if you can’t risk coming into my space. You won’t reap my soul so easily.”

“I thought I already told you I didn’t intend to,” Atsushi spun the scythe around in his grip, deflecting the spectral blade’s second and third swings as he steadied his own footing on the muddy ground. “I know you like the sound of your own voice, Kusakawa, but I’m sick of it. Nothing more you have to say interests me. If your sword is capable of defeating me and ending my life, prove it with your skills, not your boasts. We’re not negotiating, we’re fighting... something which we do properly in Eleventh, even if you don’t in Twelfth.”

Shougo snorted, wrinkling up his nose in distaste, but he made no further comment, and for a while the only sound that could be heard across the windswept, bloodsoaked plain was the clash of weapon against weapon, and the grunts and breaths of the two fighters as they worked to avoid the other’s swings.

Despite his snappish comments to the contrary, Atsushi knew only too well that Shougo had an exemplary military record as well as a scientific one. Though they had never trained together, he knew that Shougo’s close friendship with Anabomi of the Ninth had led to many invitations and training sessions in Sixth District, and that one of the main reasons that Shougo had been so trusted to carry out these missions to Rukongai was on account of his superior ability with his sword. So far as normal weaponry went, Atsushi was fairly confident that his own training experience and regime was superior, but now, in the heavy, grey atmosphere of the wasteland Rukon, he was discovering that Yachuu Ryoujin in released form was a whole different kettle of fish to a sealed blade. More than once he thought he had the weapon pinned, only for Shougo to ghost away from him with an amused chuckle, the look in his eyes condescendingly wishing him better luck next time. Was the blade fragmenting to avoid making contact with Mokizuki’s razor sharp edge? Atsushi redoubled his focus on the point of his opponent's blade, but try as he might he could not see the weapon divide to avoid his thrust. On the contrary, as his own zanpakutou sliced down towards Shougo's shoulder, he felt a sharp pain embed itself in his lumbar region, and he let out a grunt of pain, instinctively using Mokizuki's substantial staff to push his opponent away. Blood trickled through the torn fabric of his shihakushou and soaked into the cloth of the haori, but the wound, though painful, had not done any major damage. Shougo tut-tutted, shaking his sword as if to remove invisible traces of his companion's blood.

"Now look. You've dirtied her," he scolded lightly. "I told you, didn't I? You underestimate me. Mokizuki's swings are too direct and I can avoid them."

"You think a scratch like this bothers me?" Atsushi's eyes were cold. "Do you know how the Yamamoto train their children in the top military families, Kusakawa? If that's as much as that ghost sword can do to me, you'll be swinging a long time before you put me in my grave. Reinforcements from Seireitei will come if you don't answer their spirit pages promptly, and time is moving on. Time isn't on your side."

"Fine words from a man for whom no more time remains," Shougo's expression hardened, and he drove forward, drilling his blade resolutely towards Atsushi's midriff. The Eleventh Captain was ready for him, swinging Mokizuki back down to deflect, but once more the two weapons missed making contact, and Atsushi's eyes widened slightly as at last he understood the nature of his companion's blade.

When he wants it to hit me, it can cut. But when he doesn't, it's as though it's no more than an illusion — a cloud of reishi but nothing more. It is a true ghost blade... and a physical attack against it won't do any good. It will only lay me open to his way of fighting — so I have to disrupt it. I have to become more forceful, and make it impossible for him to use that sword in the way he wants.

He took a few steps back, eying the tip of his weapon thoughtfully, and Shougo tilted his head on one side, a quizzical look on his features.

"Giving up?" he challenged. "You insult me. I know Mokizuki can do more than just slash around like that. Release your weapon properly, Atsushi-dono. I can see from your eyes that you've understood the nature of my weapon — for that I complement you, since most of its opponents are dead before they figure that out. But if you've done that, you'll know that, like this, Mokizuki can't reach me.

I told you, didn't I? You can't break into my space if you can't trace my weapon's movements."

He lifted his weapon once more, preparing a new assault, but Atsushi had no intention of waiting around for his opponent to strike.

"Hebi no Kari!" he exclaimed, swinging his weapon in a sweeping arc towards his companion's sword arm. This time, instead of simply slashing through the air, the crescent shaped blade unfolded into a concertina of six or seven identically sized and shaped lesser blades, which shot out like a snake lunging forward with its fangs bared. Despite himself, Shougo cursed, only just managing to withdraw his arm in time to avoid it being sliced cleanly in two, and as he hopped back away from the reach of the snake's blade, he cast his opponent a rueful look.

"I see. You're not interested in my head, but my sword arm, that's another matter," he observed casually, and Atsushi shrugged, watching the divided blades click back into their original position.

"You asked me to use Mokizuki properly," he responded quietly. "Don't regret it when I oblige."

He lifted the weapon again, swinging it in another arc and the snake-like blades unfolded, this time lunging towards Shougo's right lung. The scientist dodged, using Yachuu Ryoujin's ghostly surface to bat the weapon away, but Atsushi was on the front foot now, the fang-sharp edge this time burrowing deep into Shougo's left shoulder. Blood spurted from the wound, and Shougo muttered a curse, using his bare hand to rip the weapon away from his skin.

"Now you have ruined my haori," he said blackly. "I told you, didn't I? They're difficult and expensive to clean."

"I was aiming for your right side, but never mind," Atsushi withdrew the weapon once more, spots of blood spattering from the ends onto the muddy ground. "You're lucky I'm going so easily on you. The rumours about Mokizuki decapitating Hollows in less than a second? All true. Mokizuki has the sharpest edge of any sword in the Yamamoto Clan, so if I really wanted to kill you, you'd probably be dead by now."

"It's a pity for you that you don't, then, because it gives me the advantage," Shougo snapped back, and Atsushi saw a haze of energy cloak itself around his sword as he raised it, thrusting it out between them as though ensuring that the other man kept his distance. "Moumokujin!"

Atsushi was not sure what happened next. One minute Shougo had been standing before him, blade outstretched and a look of angry determination on his fair features, and the next, a cloud of something grey and eerie had begun to spread all around him, concealing not only Shougo but the entirety of his surroundings from view. Alarmed, he thrust out a hand, trying to gauge what was going on, but his fingers slipped through the mist and disappeared, strange, fragmented energy prickling against his skin. He took a step back, then another, and from somewhere nearby he heard a disembodied laugh. Frantically he tried to place it, but the cloud of fog that had surrounded him was growing darker, as though night had begun to set at an alarming speed.

“What did you do?” His words bounced out into the ether, muffled and echoey, as though he alone had been confined in this night-like prison, and from somewhere beyond, he heard a derisive snort.

“My sword’s name is Midnight Hunter,” Shougo had moved, but try as he might, Atsushi could not pinpoint his companion’s location. “Now, perhaps, you understand why. Shinigami can’t see in the dark, Atsushi-dono. They rely far too much on their eyes and their spirit senses, but Yachuu Ryoujin foxes both of those. The mist that surrounds you is Yachuu’s aura. Do you feel stifled? Blinded, perhaps? Well, you should. My sword has penetrated deep into your eyes, slipping into your pupils, cloaking your retina and preventing the light from getting through. While you stumble about in darkness, you can’t hope to defend yourself against me. You are as helpless as a vole when an owl is hunting it... you can consider me your owl.”

Something sharp suddenly pierced through the cloud, digging deep into Atsushi’s stomach, and he gasped, flinching back from the pain. Though he looked, he could not see anything, his own body now concealed from view, and as he felt the sharp implement being withdrawn. It had only been a test swing, to judge how impaired he had become, and he dragged a heavy breath into his lungs, struggling to suppress the waves of panic now ruling his system. Shougo had imprisoned him, and he did not know from where or when the fatal attack would come. He could not sense his companion’s reiatsu through the heavy mist against his skin, and though his eyes had begun to water, irritated by Yachuu Ryoujin’s enforced presence, no matter how hard he blinked, he could not bring back his sight.

“Are you crying? A tough man like you?” Shougo’s words were light, mocking, amused, and they ricocheted cruelly around the midnight prison. “How pitiful. Still, don’t worry. I’ll dry those tears for you, Atsushi-dono. Time is up. I’m done here.”

Atsushi's heart began racing in his chest, his grip around the staff of his sword tightening. He could still feel his weapon, even if he couldn't see it. He could feel it, there between his fingers, and if he focused, if he used all of his energy on Mokizuki, then surely... surely he could still fight. Shougo would aim for a vital spot — a lung, his jugular, even his brain. If he could keep the other's sword at bay...

Slowly he began to swing the weapon round, growing faster and faster as he attempted to use its spinning motion as a shield against any potential attack. Blind, he took a faltering step forward, then another, struggling in vain to listen for any sign of his opponent. A soft footfall from behind sent shockwaves through his body, and more by instinct than by design he swung around. If he was going to live through this, he had no choice but to keep fighting, but against an enemy he could not see...

"Akuin Akka!"

The words left his lips before he knew he was going to say them, his entire energy flowing into Mokizuki's staff and lighting up the whole weapon like a sudden, spiritual beacon. His life was his weapon's life, his every breath in the blade of his zanpakutou and, as the bond between them grew deeper and steadier, Atsushi could make out the faintest of silhouettes, grainy and unclear, but unmistakably...

The blade had come out towards him before he could counter it, plunging deep into his back and striking clean through his heart, burrowing through bone and splintering his ribs to break through on the other side. The pain was an excruciating one, turning his entire vision red then black then red again, but still he clung on to Mokizuki's staff, refusing to loosen his grip for even the briefest of seconds. From the world outside there was a gasp, then the blade that had stabbed through him began to disintegrate into nothing. His body still a world of blood and pain, it was all Atsushi could do to keep his hold on Mokizuki, trusting his existence to the sword which had always worked so dutifully at his side. Seconds passed like minutes, minutes like hours in what seemed like complete silence, then, little by little, the haze of midnight began to disperse, chinks of light breaking through the fog and illuminating his vision once more.

His hands were sticky with blood, coagulating against Mokizuki's fine staff, and for a moment all he could do was draw air into his lungs, focusing on one breath, then another, then another. The light surrounding his sword began to dim, little by little, as he allowed his energy to return to his body, seeping slowly back through his limbs and his veins and into his vital organs. The heart which, for a moment had almost stopped beating once more jerked into life, and as he glanced down at himself, he could see the tear across the front of his uniform, where Shougo's blade had pierced him through.

But there was no wound, and there was no blood.

Atsushi dragged further gulps of air into his lungs, exhaustion and dizziness threatening to rob him of his consciousness. It was several moments before he could raise his gaze to look for his opponent, and when he did, he felt a sick sense of realisation creep over his battered senses.

Shougo lay face down on the ground before him, a pool of blood spreading out around his body. Even without getting up, Atsushi knew that his companion was dead, a fatal blow through the heart which had struck the life out of him in a single moment.

Akuin Akka.

Atsushi swallowed hard, feeling physically sick as he realised what he had done.

Was that your will or mine, Mokizuki? I put my heart and my soul into you and trusted you to protect me — but was it you or I who said those words and condemned Kusakawa to his fate?

He lifted a clumsy left hand, pressing it against his unhurt chest.

Akuin Akka. Sowing evil, reaping evil. What you do to your opponent rebounds upon you. Had I struck him, I would have lain dead... and his attempt to kill me... ultimately...

You trusted your life to me, Master. Together, we saved it. You should not regret this. He was not worthy of life.

It wasn't our judgement to make.

Slowly, unsteadily, Atsushi dragged himself to his feet, using Mokizuki as a support and taking a hesitant step towards his companion. Kneeling at the other Captain's side, he paid no heed to the blood that now covered his own uniform, turning the other man's body over and gazing down into the glazed, glassy eyes.

His aim was extremely good. Scientifically precise, I would say. An inch or two either side — well, he might've lived.

And all evidence of what he did died with him.

At least it did not die with you.

No.

Atsushi sealed his weapon, resting the blade against Shougo's body as he used his free hand to close the other man's eyes.

But now there's nothing I can do about it. I have no proof of anything without Kusakawa himself. More, if it were to be known that I killed him, even if I did do it in self defence...

There is no need for the other shinigami to know any of this.

Mokizuki was dismissive.

This may not be their justice, but it is justice all the same. There are no other suspects. The incidents will stop. His death is the same here as it would be there.

Atsushi sighed heavily, sheathing his sword and, fumbling at Shougo's obi for the spirit device that he knew his companion had carried, he got unsteadily to his feet. He took a few steps away from the body of the Twelfth Division Captain, returning to where Sakanoue still lay silent on the ground, and for a moment he just gazed down at his adjutant, pain in his heart. He had avenged his young Vice Captain, but his doing so could not bring the man back to life. He gazed around him for any sign of witnesses to his and Shougo's altercation, but he could see nobody within his immediate line of sight, and, inwardly, he made up his mind.

He wrapped his bloody fingers around the spirit pager, using the last of his reiryoku to activate its sensors. At his touch, a pair of dark, gossamer wings like those from a Hell Butterfly spread out from either side, and a haze of kidou engulfed his hand, opening up a spirit connection to the world on the other side of the Sekkiseki divide.

"This is Minaichi," he spoke gruffly, his voice weary and out of breath. "Send help, urgently, over. Kusakawa, Sakanoue down. Sekime, condition unknown, but likely injured, need medical help. Enemy force far worse than we thought. Heavy losses. Need urgent assistance, over."

As someone's voice crackled through on the other end, Atsushi found he could no longer make out one word from another. The world blurred and swam around him and, with a little gasp, he crumpled, toppling forward onto the muddy, bloody ground.

Author's Note: Swords... and...

Atsushi's sword is Mokizuki 喪忌月 "Mourning Moon", and Shougo's is Yachuu Ryoujin 夜中獵人 "Midnight Hunter". The release command for Mokizuki, Kubi o tore means "take his head", as in decapitate. Yo o ogamu means "worship the night." Mokizuki's attacks are "Hebi no Kari" (蛇の刈り) Snake's Reaper), which is the unfolding of multiple blades from the one

— if you’ve seen Inuyasha, it’s similar to what one of the Shichinintai uses in its function. The other release, Akuin Akka 悪因悪果 is a bit more sinister. Atsushi cannot use this attack easily. By entrusting everything to his sword, even his life, it is the ultimate and last ditch attempt at self-defence. As explained in the story, it takes any hit aimed at Atsushi, and rebounds it on the striker. Bringing his body to the level of using Akuin Akka drains almost the entirety of his spirit power, rendering him extremely vulnerable to attack and he is at risk of dying if he loses his grip for even one moment on Mokizuki’s staff while the fight is still going on, as doing so can reverse the effects of the technique back on his own body. Shougo was killed because he stabbed Atsushi through the heart, and this rebounded back on him. In short, Akuin Akka = you reap what you sow.

Shougo’s sword technique, Moumokuji 盲目刃 literally means, “blinded blade”, and I think it’s effects are pretty self-explanatory.

So there it is people. The real truth about the Rukon, and Kusakawa junior’s identity, the former Captain of the Twelfth Division, Shougo-dono.

Do people still hate Atsushi-kun? O.O

In case you are wondering, Kusakawa Shougo is the son of Kusakawa Daigo, the creator of the Kamen no Gunzei fighting in the Real World. It was Daigo who set up the mountain lab in the Real World, which Shougo later inherited and Keitarou took control of. It was also Daigo who was the first victim Keitarou slew with Chudokuga’s bankai release. Shougo’s science was never quite at Daigo’s level, and so he was unable to replicate the conditions which created Aki, Haruya and Moe, despite his best attempts — nor was he able to stabilise their spirit energy. Both Daigo and Shougo treated the three Kamen no Gunzei unforgivably, breaking the sanity of both Moe and Aki, and creating the deep hatred of the Urahara possessed by all three.

Shougo is loosely number two on the “modes of death” chart. Though Shougo doesn’t really fit “aging”, he represents the inevitability of death and the arrogance of Barragan. Despite being already dead and no ally of Keitarou, his actions, his creations, his work and even his death have all operated in Keitarou’s favour — an ally by proxy because the truth of the past was never fully known.

Everything up to this point should, of course, have now rendered the identity of the spy completely obvious. ;)

66. No Way Back

Chapter Sixty Four: No Way Back

A sudden chill had settled over the woodland copse, and, as the creature's hands brushed against the charred edges of the damaged haori once more, Kyouki swung her sword down, slicing through the Hollow-man's fingers. He let out a yell, falling backwards in surprise and dismay, but no blood spurted from the wound, and Kyouki wondered if she was now fighting a beast who was too much Hollow to continue to bleed. If that was the case, killing him might require a completely different line of approach. Gekkoushin was shimmering with an eerie blue light now, as the Night Moon took over from the Day. The sweep of her blade had clearly caused her opponent some agitation, for he was keeping his distance from her, favouring his injured left hand and glaring at her like a wounded animal adjudging how best to settle the insult. With their confrontation creating such a ruckuss, Kyouki felt certain there were no wild critters anywhere at hand, but she did not know how much strength he had already absorbed from consuming Ryuusei's arm and the squirrels in the trees. Would his limb once more be able to heal? She waited, but nothing happened. With a frown, she glanced at the edge of her weapon, noticing for the first time the smear of blood that tainted the proud blade. Her eyes became slits as she contemplated this. There had been no spray of blood, but that was not because her opponent no longer had the capability to bleed. On the contrary, the sheer edge and freezing temperature of Gekkoushin's blade had sealed the wound the moment the two had made contact, and any blood had frozen and congealed on the spot.

Knowing he still had a beating heart gave Kyouki some reassurance. She had fought Hollows before, and she had fought men, but she had never had to fight an amalgamation of the two. It had thrown her and she had been frightened, but now she berated herself for that weak reaction, hardening her spirit and rallying her resolve to win. Gekkoushin had been right, her son was bleeding and injured, and he needed her. She had no time to waste on fighting this creature, not when Ryuusei's life was in the balance. Whether her son lived or died, she knew that, as long as he was able, he would be asking for her, worried about her absence from his side. He would know that she had released her sword, and was fighting. Anxious patients often bled more, and suffered greater complications. She needed to put an end to things here so she could go and reassure him all was well — and that took priority over everything.

Yes, even over finding the exile, Keitarou.

Kyouki slipped Gekkoushin through the thin Real World air, noting how her every move was being followed by her companion's predatorial gaze. The mood of the battle had changed— he was no longer playing with her, nor was the confrontation going according to his plans rather than hers. Her shift in spiritual approach had alarmed him, but the respectful distance that he was now giving her told her once more that this creature was far from the mad, reckless beast she had first considered him to be. His thought processes were not hers, but they were rational and calculated and she could not underestimate him. The more time she gave him, the more likely it was that he would find a way to counter her, and so she had to use this moment of hesitation to push home her advantage.

Gekkoushin's Night Moon could be used freely through the forestland, as it caused less damage to the local environment by freezing it than by setting it aflame. It had proven more effective in holding off her foe, but unless she could get a direct blow in on a vital organ, she was unlikely to be able to stop him. If he lost interest in fighting her, or decided she was too much of a risk, he might retreat into the dense woodland thickets beyond. He was hunting her for food, but if the hunt proved too dangerous, he would give up and move on elsewhere. Fifth Division were still too close to this place for her to assume he would not find them — and with wounded men among their number, it would be easy pickings. The creature had stopped attacking them only because she had come and confronted him, sending up a challenge he had read and responded to. He knew as well as she did that there were other, more viable victims out there — and he had already tasted the spirit-rich blood of her eldest son.

The longer he did not attack her, the more Kyouki felt certain that he was weighing up his options, deciding whether to continue or whether to turn tail and flee. There was no longer any time left to strategise how Gekkoushin's Night Moon might be used to bring him down — if she wanted to stop him, she would need to act bigger, and throw him so completely off his guard that this landscape which he considered his territory became foreign and alien, a place of danger, rather than his safe haven. She had to make this place her own, and there was only one way she could do that.

Her gaze flitted to the edge of her sword, seeing the smear of blood again, and drawing reassurance from it. She could hurt him. If she was clever, and quick, and decisive, she could kill him. There was one chance, and she would take it. Gently she moved her left hand to cover the hilt of her sword, and the creature flinched, tensing up at her movement as though anticipating a flare of Kidou magic. Fragments of energy surrounded his body, as though he were beginning to pull together shreds of his aura to fire a Cero in defence, but Kyouki was not about to wait for that to happen.

“Bankai,” she murmured. “Gekkoushin Nisshoku.”

As soon as the words had left her lips, the entire forest began to grow dark, a spreading shadow of energy that stretched long, tendril like fingers across the small, claustrophobic copse, each one winding itself lovingly around the trunk of a tree.. The creature started, confused and alarmed as the rays of sunlight filtering through the boughs began to disappear one by one, and the woodland became cloaked in night. He fidgeted, taking a step or two back towards the ring of trees that flanked the clearing, but the darkness was soon all around him, blocking out his familiar pathways and occluding even the tiniest fragment of light from penetrating the shield. As the air grew thicker, denser and darker, Kyouki could sense her opponent’s rising agitation, hearing the rustle of his feet against the ground. He wanted to flee, even without words she understood his panic, but still he hesitated, no longer sure of where to go or how to hide.

He could no longer see her, nor the smile of satisfaction that had spread across the Fifth Division Captain’s lips. Though his peering, penetrating eyes and his bloodstained mask were now hidden from her line of sight, too, she did not feel afraid. On the contrary, even if she could not see her opponent, the blackness was soothing, for it proved she was not fighting this battle alone. Gekkoushin had brought the darkness, luring night-time into the bright sun of midday, and, even in this pitch black, Gekkoushin could see her way. Kyouki closed her eyes, allowing her sword’s senses to take over from her own. In the black of her own mind she could now make out the faintest of outlines, a soft, bluish aura that told her her opponent was still close at hand. On fours, he was padding and pawing around in a small circle, still a safe distance away, and his agitation was clearly growing. Flickers of spiritual energy danced against the shape, growing bolder as the creature attempted to figure out some form of defence for what was happening, but it was not that which had most attracted Kyouki’s attention. Through the gloom of her mind’s eye she could see the proof that this individual was not yet all Hollow, for, in the region of his left chest was a soft, hazy outline of something she had not seen before. Something which was gently, rhythmically moving.

His heart.
Gekkoushin?

Kyouki resisted the urge to open her eyes, instead reaching out her thoughts to her sword's spirit.

You've never had to use this skill to kill a living soul before, Kyouki.

Gekkoushin's response answered the question she had not known how to ask.

Our Bankai is still young. In the past, you've seen Hollows, and struck them apart, but this one is different. He has not completely turned yet. To kill him, you must still his heart, not break his mask. My blade is still frozen from the Night Moon release. Be careful. The longer you hesitate, the more likely he will find a way to evade you. He is not like other souls. He is feral, and wild animals understand dark and light and find ways to adjust that tamed ones cannot.

Understood.

Kyouki focused her attention on the hazy outline, watching him pad up and down along the edge of the trees. The head was lowered towards the ground, as though he was using his sense of smell to try and regain his bearings. Kyouki's own spirit power was heavy and cloying in the air, claiming the territory for her own, but still he persevered, searching for the glimmer of a familiar track into the woods. If she lost him in the trees, it would be impossible to snare him, for Gekkoushin's Eclipse could not follow an individual, it could only cover the area in which it had been released. If the creature broke out of the copse, she would lose track of him — and in that time, he might find and kill more of her men.

There was no more time to wait.

Her eyes still tightly closed, Kyouki redoubled her focus on her target, forcing her thoughts down, down, down towards the beating, vibrating shadow of her opponent's spiritual heart. As she did so, he paused, then turned to face her, as though something in the intensity of her aura had drawn him to sense out where she was. He was considering, she realised, gauging his chances of launching an attack in the darkness, and with a sudden sense of concern she wondered whether, as Gekkoushin had feared, his eyes had adjusted to the darkness quickly enough for him to see her. He was no longer so agitated, and the sense of excitement that had pervaded his aura was beginning to return. Did he think the game was still on? Well, he would soon find out that the rules had changed.

Slowly, Kyouki parted her hands, feeling the judder of her sword's pull as it fought to break free of her control. Taking a final deep breath to calm herself, she released her grasp on Gekkoushin's hilt completely.

"Tsukiya," she murmured. There was a whoosh of spiritual energy, and a freezing shaft of air blew back against her skin as the sword shot forth like a barb from a crossbow. The next minute something dazzling and bright tore apart her internal vision, and there was a terrible, awful howl of pain and terror as, somewhere in the flare of light, something was cut down.

The thud of a body against the ground was followed by sudden, eerie stillness, and Kyouki opened one eye cautiously, noticing that the darkness that had enshrouded the copse was beginning to fade and shred away at the edges. As the clearing grew brighter, she could make out the shape of her opponent lying crumpled on the ground. Blood pooled weakly from a wound in his chest, from which penetrated the distinctive ice blue blade and carved hilt of Kyouki's zanpakutou. The force of the attack had shattered her Bankai release, but the weapon still remained in full shikai, and as light penetrated the copse once more, it glinted off the weapon, giving it an eerie glow. As the Fifth Division Captain made her way across the grass to retrieve her weapon, she saw with some relief that the mask that had covered the creature's face had begun to crack and chip away, and, as she pulled Gekkoushin free, a further lazy trickle of blood leaked out from the open wound. Wiping her weapon clean on her obi, she set it aside on the ground, turning her attention to her opponent to make sure he was really dead. A touch of his throat confirmed Kyouki's convictions. Although Gekkoushin's frozen blade had only glanced across the edge of the heart, it had caused enough damage to freeze its rhythm, preventing the Hollow-man's body from effecting any emergency regenerative repairs. Ice had been his weakness where fire had not. The pulsing rhythm had ceased, and the fight was done.

Retrieving her weapon, she sealed it, returning it to its sheath, then turned the body onto its back. As she did so, the last of the mask fell away, revealing the face below, and for a moment Kyouki faltered, struck by the human visage that had lurked deep below the layers of chalk. He looked young, she realised, young enough to be the same age as her own second son, and this disturbed her more than she cared to admit. He no longer looked like a monster, but simply a scrawny, skinny young man, with fair hair, and a delicate complexion. His eyes were half-open, enough that Kyouki could see the pale shade of the iris lurking beneath the lids, but his expression was not twisted into a grotesque mask of pain, madness or fear. He seemed more like he was half-asleep, and she brushed his eyelids closed, unnerved by what she had seen.

Not a man and not a Hollow, but both at the same time. A vicious, feral hunter who had run wild through these forests and savaged both the native people and her own division members... but in that moment, Kyouki's maternal instinct made her wish that, somehow, she had been able to help, not hurt him.

Don't lose your wits, idiot. This isn't the time or the place, not when he might have killed your son and heir.

Gekkoushin's judgement was less sympathetic, and, allowing herself a wry smile, Kyouki got to her feet, nodding her head.

"We'll go to Ryuusei and the others now, Gekkoushin. Don't worry, I haven't lost my mind," she said aloud. "I was just curious... I wanted to see what I had really been fighting."

And did you get your answer?

"No..." Kyouki's brow creased. "No. I'm not sure that answer is possible, not now. He looks... like any young man might, now. Not a Hollow, not a monster, just... a young man, like my son or no... more like one of Nagesu's. He looks like an Urahara, Gekkoushin. Strikingly, in all respects."

And now he's dead, so let's get back to the people who matter to us. Carrion isn't for us to hover over — you're not a vulture.

"Fine. Message understood," Kyouki sighed, but nodded, patting the hilt of her sword lightly before slipping into shunpo. As the wielder of a light-based zanpakutou, shunpo was one of Kyouki's gifts, and it was not long at all before she was dropping out of the flash-step in the vicinity of abandoned human stone ruins, to where the remaining members of Fifth Division had retreated.

"Taichou!" At the sight of her, Arai was on his feet, hope and relief in his gaze, and at his exclamation, a murmur went up from around the camp, more than one officer stirring from where they had sat, hunched and dazed in huddles on the ground. "Taichou, your haori!?"

"Better the haori than me," Kyouki's words were far more nonchalant than she felt, and she greeted her Third seat with a tired grin. "He was a bit more of a problem than I anticipated, but it's done with. He's dead, so he won't come back. What do you have to report, Arai? What state are we left in, following his ambush?"

"Yes..." Arai's eyes flickered for a moment, but he nodded his head, turning to glance towards the edge of the group. Kyouki's eyes narrowed as she followed his gaze, her heart clenching slightly as she made out three or four bundled forms, covered over with a rough camp sheet taken from their supplies. She turned back to her officer, arching an eyebrow, and Arai nodded.

“We lost four men, Taichou,” he said softly, his words shaking slightly as he recounted this fact. “Three were dead before we left the scene, but you said everyone, so we brought everyone, regardless. The other, he died when we got here. We couldn’t do anything... he wasn’t alone, Taichou, we made sure of that, but I don’t know if he saw us or not before he slipped away.”

“I see,” Kyouki took a deep breath that sounded like a sigh, but was, in reality, her steadying her own composure. “And what about injuries? What about that?”

What about Ryuusei, she wanted to scream, but as a Captain, she knew she could not. Still, Arai had worked with her long enough to understand her thoughts, and he offered her a weak smile.

“The injured are in the shade of the wall, Kyouki-sama, out of the sun, as there were flies bothering them,” he said simply. “Seikyou-dono is watching over them. He volunteered to, and I thought it would be as well to let him, since Fukutaichou was among them.”

“Ryuusei is alive?” Kyouki’s question came out more sharply than she had intended, and Arai nodded.

“Yes, ma’am,” he agreed gravely, “but... I don’t know what else to do for him. We’ve stopped his bleeding, but there’s not much we can do for the pain. It’s a bad wound, and he’s been in and out of consciousness. He claims it doesn’t hurt, but I’m sure that can’t be the case. When he’s awake, he’s trying to give orders, but they’re not making a lot of sense. I’ve tried to keep people from bothering him, as much so as they don’t get frightened by seeing him as for any other reason. I hoped... you would come back soon. I’m not a healer, but I think... probably... Ryuusei-dono needs to get back to Seireitei pretty soon. Otherwise...”

“We should’ve brought healers with us,” Kyouki muttered, unable to suppress her maternal anxieties any further. Pushing past her Third Seat, she hurried in the direction he had indicated, noticing three officers laid out in the shade of the wall. One of them was propping himself up on his arm, sipping water gingerly from someone else’s gourd, and the second lay unconscious on the ground, but there was little blood and Kyouki soon realised he had escaped being savaged, his pale complexion suggesting he had passed out from the shock and horror of the whole incident. Closest to the wall lay another, motionless figure, and as she approached him, the shadow that was crouched at his side got to his feet, moving to greet her.

“Obaasama.”

Seikyou's cheeks were stained with tears, his lashes still wet, but he gazed up at his Grandmother bravely.

“I'm sorry, I mean... I mean, Taichou. I've been... tending to... to the injured, like Arai-san told me. Can I report, please?”

“Report, Seikyou,” Kyouki nodded, patting the boy on the shoulder. “What do you have to tell me?”

“Yes, Taichou,” Seikyou's head bobbed forward in a relieved nod. “We have three injured officers. Inamoto-san's got a wounded leg. Oguchi-san hit his head and I think he has a concussion. And... and...”

“And your father?” Kyouki's question was gentle, but pressing, and Seikyou's young features trembled at the question.

“I don't know what to do,” he admitted, fear and panic in his tones. “Arai-san managed to stop his bleeding, and I helped, but... but... Obaasama... there's... nothing left. It's gone. Completely. His arm. And he says... he says it doesn't hurt, but... I know he's just trying to reassure me. He doesn't want me to feel to blame, but I do. He protected me, and because of that... because he did... I...”

“Ryuusei did what any parent would do when their child is in danger, Seikyou. You're not to blame at all,” Kyouki assured him. “Stay there and stand guard for me, will you? I'll speak to your father myself, all right? That's an order.”

“Yes, T... Taichou,” Seikyou managed a tearful salute, and Kyouki offered him a brief smile before crossing the short stretch of land to where her eldest son and heir lay. His head was cushioned on a pillow of grass that Seikyou had probably gathered from the local area, and a torn scrap of obi, folded and damp lay across the man's brow, as though to stem a rising fever. He was breathing quickly, the rise and fall of his chest reassuring to the anxious mother, but though the left shoulder was wrapped heavily in makeshift bandages, an ominous, seeping stain and the evidence of blood on the ground told her that it had not been easy to stem the wound. Ryuusei's arm was gone, and no amount of bandages could conceal the extent of the disfiguring injury. Kyouki knelt down at her son's side, her heart in her chest as she considered the implications of his wound. Though she had encountered officers who had had to have part or all of an arm removed through injury in the past, she had never encountered a situation in which a shinigami had had his arm ripped clean off. Had Ryuusei been bitten, too? Tearing to the man's shihakushou suggested the attack had been more savage than simply the gargantuan throw that had severed arm from body, and she bit her lip, struggling to hold on to her usual composure.

Her son was alive, but Arai's judgement was right. Ryuusei needed proper treatment, else he might not make it back. Fleetingly, Kyouki remembered Souja, savaged and alone far from his kin, and she wondered whether her family were about to be the next victim of Keitarou's ruthless purge.

"Okaasama?"

A soft whisper from the patient drew her thoughts from such horrific ideas, and she turned, meeting her son's hazy gaze with a troubled one of her own.

"I'm sorry... I've caused... such a fuss," Ryuusei lifted his right arm weakly, moving it to touch Kyouki's hand. "I... wanted to take... charge... but Arai... thought..."

"Arai is doing fine, and I'm here now, so you can rest," Kyouki told him firmly. "Seikyou is doing a fine job of standing guard, and the threat has been eliminated. There's no sign of Keitarou in these parts, and so I will be arranging to return to camp base point as soon as I can work out the best way to transport our injured men to the Gate. Hang on a while longer for me, all right? The Fourth will see to you, and then you'll be right as rain."

"I know... my arm is gone," Ryuusei's brows were creased, but he made no complaint. "Arai... told me it was... torn... but I don't think my shoulder is broken."

"We'll leave that to the experts. For the time being, you're as good as you can be, and shouldn't worry about a thing. Arai's stopped your bleeding, and so you're in no danger," Kyouki knew she was lying, but she had no idea what else to say. "Try to bear with it a little longer, all right? The men will be scared otherwise."

"I'm fine, Okaasama. It doesn't hurt that much," Ryuusei's voice was fading, and Kyouki could see his eyelids becoming heavy. She rested her hand gently on his chest, feeling for his heart. It was still beating, but faster than she would have liked, and she sighed, watching her son's eyes flutter closed.

This is the cost of fighting a war against an enemy who hides in shadows and plays games. I won't lose my son too, Keitarou. You might've stolen Hirata's, and you might've stolen Guren-dono's, but you won't take mine, no matter whether I have to take him back to the Gate myself in full defiance of our orders here.

“Kyouki-sama?”

A fresh voice on the scene made her jump, and she swung around, meeting the horrified gaze of Shiketsu, Vice Captain of the Third.

“Shiketsu-dono!”

“Kyouki-sama... what...” Shiketsu was clearly speechless, his eyes fixed on Ryuusei’s battered body, all the colour draining from his cheeks. As she gazed up at him, Kyouki was again reminded of the pale skin and fair hair of the young man she had killed in the forest, and she frowned.

“Ryuusei is alive, Shiketsu, and you didn’t come here to gawp at him,” she chided briskly. “You have a message from your Captain, correct? I’ll hear it.”

“Oh. Yes. Yes, I’m sorry,” Shiketsu shook himself out of his reverie, clearly flustered. “I didn’t know Ryuusei was injured, and it was a shock, seeing a friend... but Father sent me to summon Fifth back to the Senkaimon. He and Midori-sama have discovered something that changes the situation and we have to reassess our action plan.”

“That suits me, although I intend on taking my son back through the Gate as soon as it can be activated to take us,” Kyouki got to her feet, raising her voice. “Arai! Prepare everyone to return to base camp. Our mission here is done. I’ll need six officers to help with the wounded — and you too, if you please. Leave the dead somewhere secure for now — we’ll return for them when there’s more time to do so.”

“The... dead?” Shiketsu paled again, and Kyouki grimaced.

“We faced a vicious opponent, half Hollow, half man, who now lies dead in that forest,” she said categorically. “If your father wants to use his body as a lab study, he’s all yours... but I have more pressing needs. Ryuusei needs proper medical treatment and it can’t wait.”

Shiketsu looked troubled, but nodded his head.

“Yes, ma’am,” he said softly. “I’ll return to base camp and inform Father you’re bringing wounded men back with you. Yunosuke has some healer training and he might be able to make Ryuusei more comfortable whilst Father is prepping the gate. In the circumstances, it might be best if Fifth go straight back to Seireitei.”

“Do that,” A flicker of hope flared in Kyouki’s heart, and she nodded. “Tell Yunosuke, whatever he can do will be most welcome... and we’ll be there as soon as we can manage it.”

So, Kyouki had resorted to Bankai.

In the mud-clogged village, some distance away from the forest in which his comrade was fighting, Guren had felt the swell of spirit power as keenly as if she had been right in front of him, and its meaning was not lost on him. Kyouki was a competent, accomplished fighter who had made even the most misogynistic of Clan Leaders sit up and take notice, and as a result Gekkoushin was one of the most respected weapons among the current class of Captains. It was not a sword whose considerable power Kyouki used lightly, and Guren's brows knitted together as he contemplated what kind of opponent had forced her to resort to such tactics. Had she come up against such a formidable opponent that she had had no choice but to use the skill she had only mastered such a short few years before, or had some other sense of urgency driven her forth? Had she encountered the exile they all sought? But even though Guren longed to rip Keitarou's heart out on the end of his zanpakutou blade, he knew that he could not abandon his duty to his companions by fleeing this fight.

When he had arrived on the scene, the level of spirit power the Hollow man had emitted had been intoxicating and somewhat nauseating, the levels of rage rippling over him in intense waves. He had sent Shirogane and Ryuu back as soon as he had realised the situation, for it had been clear to him that neither one of his two subordinates would be able to continue the confrontation on such a level. Unwilling to lose his nephews in the way he had lost his son, he had given the order, and, to his relief, neither man had hesitated in obeying.

Now it was for him to finish what they had begun.

The creature had calmed following the explosion Guren had unleashed on the remaining village shack, the blast bringing him back to a measure of rationality. Anger still seeped through every pore of his body, pooling into the toxic reiatsu his body pumped into the atmosphere, but the flares of red energy and the destabilising reiatsu had dissipated, and the hulking figure was once more in control of his actions. There was hate in his eyes, his fingers clenched and clawed as though longing to grab and rip Guren limb from limb, but despite it, the man had held back in his attack, gauging his new opponent before launching himself recklessly into the fray.

"Your friend seems to have got flustered," now he spoke, his voice low and rasping, as though the mask that cloaked his face and head like a helmet had seeped through his skin and engulfed his vocal chords. "Maybe she found Moe too much for her to handle. He's like that, if he finds prey that's worth his time to hunt."

Guren's gaze narrowed.

"If you have time to focus on other people's battles, you must misunderstand the danger you're currently in," he said softly, and the man snorted, shaking his head. He kicked at the dirt on the ground, sending splatters of mud up against the leg of his peasant's robes, and Guren felt a flare of suppressed anger radiating from Haruya's body. Clearly he was still fighting the rage impulses, then, in order to remain rational enough to fight. Guren slotted this information away in the back of his mind, his gaze never leaving his opponent for one moment.

"You sent my playmates away," Haruya's words had a malicious edge to them. "I was about to carve my name into them, and send them back to entice a proper opponent to come out and show himself, but it seems you reacted prematurely. You Kuchiki are overly protective of one another, I must say. Does nobody in your Clan fight his own battle, one on one any more? What a cowardly group you must be."

"Careful," Guren's eyes glittered with contempt. "You might start believing your own lies, and falling foul of them. Contrary to your belief, none of us came to the Real World to find you, or to fight you. I sent my men back to attend to their real duties, whilst I cleaned up the minor annoyance that distracted them."

"Minor annoyance?" The words reverberated out from behind the mask, and Guren saw red light glittering around Haruya's fingers, as though he was contemplating firing a Cero. "Do you not understand what you are faced with? I'm not a fool. I know that that's a haori, and that means you're the person I was waiting to lure out and fight. You're the Kuchiki Captain, correct? I don't need to know your name, it's all the same to me. You're my opponent, and I'll fight you properly. Your people are arrogant, but you don't understand the first thing about what I am or what I can do."

Guren's mind flitted back to the mutated form of his brother, howling and screeching across the ruined landscape of his manor estate, and his lips thinned.

"You would be surprised what I understand about deviations like you," he said coldly. "I didn't come here to converse with you, however. Unless you intend to provide information about the target we seek, I have no interest in you. Therefore, if it's all the same to you, I'd like you to save your self-aggrandising bragging for the afterlife. I find it rather tiresome to make smalltalk with creatures of no consequence, and I would rather not waste time. I do have a proper mission to attend to.”

At the derision in Guren’s words, Haruya’s aura flared with electric crimson energy, but, just as it seemed as though he was about to unleash another violent explosion of energy, the light dulled, and he let out a bitter chuckle.

“Ah yes. You want to find Keitarou,” he spoke mockingly. “That’s all your underlings squawked about. Keitarou. Keitarou. As though I intend to tell you anything about him.”

“I very much doubt there’s anything you could tell me about him that I don’t already know,” Guren’s grey eyes became ice cold, and he darted forward, swinging his zanpakutou down towards Haruya’s horned helmet mask. Haruya ducked, dodging his considerable bulk out of the way of the swing, but Guren’s zanpakutou was in full release, and, as the weapon passed within close proximity of the remaining horn, it shook then shattered, crumbling into fragments of powdery dust. Haruya let out a curse, dropping to the ground and rolling away to avoid further damage, and Guren’s lips twisted into a cold, even smile.

“You thought you were playing games with my men, but you will find that fighting them was preferable,” he said darkly. “I have barely begun to utilise Tenkyourei to its full capacity.”

“Then use it,” Haruya spat out, picking himself up from the mud and giving his body a little shake to remove clods of excess mud. “Use it. Release it. Show me what you’re made of, Kuchiki Captain. I’m not afraid of you. I was told, long ago, that my spirit power was good enough for me to rank among the best in Seireitei — but I was never given that chance. People like me, we aren’t given those chances. We’re blocked, by people like you. It doesn’t matter, though. Whatever I had to go through to get here, right here and now, I’m able to use that power at last. I could’ve been a Captain, just like you, if things had been different. Well, now I have extra options. That makes me more than a Captain — and that’s more than you.”

“You appear confused as to which Captain you are fighting,” came Guren’s riposte, and he darted forward again, vanishing into shunpo before reappearing at Haruya’s rear left side and sweeping his weapon towards the man’s upper body. Again, Haruya avoided the contact, bringing his left arm up as an automatic shield, but the vibration of the sword blade sent an invisible pulse across the gap between weapon and limb, and despite himself, the Hollow man let out an exclamation of pain as the energy crashed against his forearm.

“Your bone is probably shattered,” Guren was unconcerned. “The next time, it will shatter through the skin and scatter into the mud, much like you scattered my nephew’s sword fragments. Oh yes,” as Haruya cast him a startled look, “I am aware of it. I know where Ginkyoujiki was, and I can sense its aura in this thin atmosphere. I told you once, you need to understand the enemy you are fighting. I am Kuchiki Guren, and I am the Head of the most powerful Clan in Seireitei. You understand what that means, I trust? I am not an average ‘Captain’ that you can smite down with whatever illicit powers you’ve gained from consorting with that man. At even this level of power, I am capable of hurting you. You should...”

“You should stop talking!” Haruya’s rage surged into a yell, the red flares of energy surrounding his aura condensing and thickening around his damaged limb, and to Guren’s astonishment, it twisted and bent out of shape, before clicking unnaturally back into position. “Your sword tickled me but it did not hurt me! A Hollow doesn’t suffer from broken bones! We can repair such minor injuries. You are a fool if you think you can use that glorified tuning fork to do me real damage. I told you you were arrogant and you didn’t understand. Now I’ll make you realise it for yourself.”

An explosion of crimson spirit power, malevolent and toxic burst forth from his hands, barrelling towards the Kuchiki Captain, but Guren had anticipated the shift in his opponent’s spirit power and he let out a sigh, swinging Tenkyourei’s blade through the blast and scattering it into its component atoms, sending sparks flying in all directions. He disappeared into shunpo, re-materialising within a couple of feet of his opponent, grabbing the man’s cheap hakamashita in his free left hand and flinging the other man down into the slick mud. Though Haruya was taller and more broadly built than his opponent, Guren had inherited his father’s substantial warrior’s physique, and despite himself, Haruya found himself floored, Tenkyourei’s juddering blade pointed towards his throat.

“Can you recover from a broken neck?” Guren’s words lacked any mercy, his eyes glinting with a cold, uncompromising light. “Enough empty threats. I have come to kill you. The only way you might save your sorry life is to tell me all I want to know about the man I seek. You are not on my radar, but if you persist in being unhelpful, I will take my time in dissecting you, shattering bone by bone. Tenkyourei is not a sword that likes negotiations, so I suggest that, if you value your miserable existence at all, you stop protecting the man we both know I want.”

“What is your obsession with Keitarou, anyway?” Haruya demanded, defiance in his eyes, and Guren’s eyes narrowed to slits.

“He owes me a debt for the life of my son,” he said flatly. “A debt from which I don’t intend on letting him walk without paying. His life is owed to my sword, and therefore I have come to take it. A creature like you might not understand, but in Clans like mine, the ties of blood are strong.”

“The ties of blood, huh,” Haruya spat on the ground, and Guren noticed that there was blood in the saliva, the vibrations from Tenkyourei’s tip bursting the uppermost bloodvessels in the man’s tongue and gums and causing the area of mask around the lips to crumble into dust. “Yes, I understand. People of worth to you — that’s all men like you care about. People who fit the right profile... who provide the right impression.”

Something flickered across his gaze, something other than rage, then,

“I don’t care for my life,” he said simply. “I didn’t come here to defend myself against you, I came to kill you. You, and any other shinigami I could get my hands on. Why? Because of Keitarou? Maybe it was him who first asked us for help, but the reality was that we had a grudge to settle on our own terms. You talk about the ties of blood as though it’s something only a man of good Clan stock could possibly understand, but we all have our reasons to fight. Shinigami killed my sister today, so now the grievance is personal. Whether it was a Kuchiki or someone else who killed her, it doesn’t matter. They came with you, and so you are all targets for my rage. I am not afraid of you, Kuchiki Guren. You might be a King in your own domain, but here you’re just another ghost floating through existence, invisible to the native people. We are evolved beyond what you can comprehend. I have nothing to say to you about Keitarou. If you think you can kill me, then try. Your sword has a nasty power, but my body is already building defences against it. My bones and skin are strong, and they repair quickly, so do your worst.”

He reached up his hand to grab at Tenkyourei’s blade, as if to prove his point, and Guren watched with a mixture of horror and fascination as the man’s fingers shattered and jerked out of their sockets, only to reform and repair themselves the moment Haruya drew them away. Though much of the Hollow-man’s face was concealed from him, Guren felt certain that the man was sneering, smug in his convictions. He sighed, shaking his head.

“Your logic is flawed by your anger,” he said simply. “If shinigami killed your sister, it's because you sent her to fight them. You just said that Keitarou asked you for help, and you spoke in the plural. If you hadn't thrown your sister into a battle, she would probably still live. Those are the rules of war, my friend, and you can't hold me responsible for such things."

"And the death of your son?" Haruya spat out, his eyes glinting angrily at Guren's dismissive tone. "What of that? Was that not a part of the rules of war?"

"No. That was not," Guren's voice hardened, and it was all he could do not to plunge Tenkyourei through the man's neck, but he realised that, even if he was to do so, his companion's odd regeneration system would likely find a way to counter its effects, leaving him vulnerable to a close range Cero assault. "My son was poisoned, murdered by a coward's hand to further a madman's plan. That was not war, Hollow. That was murder."

"Shinigami define things by strange rules," Haruya said coldly. "Our lives, your lives, they all have different values. Shinigami is just another word for Clan, and a synonym for dynastic perfection. You look at me and see a monster, but even without my mask, people like you would shun me. You have, all of my life. My sister and I were never given any chance in this world because of people like you. If there was a war, it began the moment we were born, and the most basic of rights was denied us. Gates shut in our face, simply because we were born the wrong side of the blankets. Scandals to be hushed up, children to be drowned down wells or pushed into rivers. You have no idea of the childhood we had or the way they treated Aki, when all she wanted was for her Father to help our Mother live through another famine. You have no idea of anything outside of your own perfect, aesthetic castle. The mask doesn't make a monster. Clansfolk, shinigami, therein lies the true evil. If Keitarou kills all of you, then he's a hero, not a villain. He didn't make us this way, Kuchiki Guren. We were taken as worthless lives, and mutated by Clan shinigami into what they wanted us to be. The creature you see now is the product of Clan greed, and so it's poetic justice that I should fight and kill you, even if it costs me my life. Even if we die, it's a cause worth fighting for — I understand that better now than I ever have before. Keitarou is the first who treated us as worth something, and his cause is right. It's about time your society reached its sell-by date, and your proud, primped, peacock sons learned their place in the true order of things."

Guren's eyes widened with shock at the genuine bitterness in Haruya's tones, then he frowned, shaking his head.

“You mistake me,” he said quietly. “I have no knowledge of your creation, nor does it interest me to know. I don’t disdain you because of the mask you wear, nor do I consider you beneath me because you claim to have been born in less than ideal circumstances. Your sobstories mean nothing to me — you are not a product of my family’s indiscretion, nor will I offer any consolation for your having been born so. You are a monster because you consort with a child’s murderer, not because you wear a mask. I told you I understood your deviation, and I do. My brother suffered from your affliction, and I fought to save his life. He is my twin in whom I have the greatest trust, not a monster to be shunned, whatever he has suffered in the past. As a boy, my closest friend was my cousin, though her mother was a serving maid, and her birth frowned upon in Clan circles. You are the one who judges me based on how I appear, not the other way around. The world you describe may yet exist, but it is changing. I am a Clansman and a Shinigami, but these days, that is no longer enough. I am also a Captain who fights to protect the lives of the ordinary people who live in my District and any other land in which my squad patrols. I pay from my own pocket when Hollows destroy villages and lay waste to crops, even if the funds of the Gotei are lacking. Your experiences may be true, or they may not, but I have no pity for you. You have assaulted my men unprovoked, causing fear and suffering to those I lead, and most of all, you have chosen to ally yourself with a man who murders innocent people for his own personal gain. That makes you beneath me, so I will kill you.”

“Give it your best shot,” Haruya retorted defiantly, no hesitation in his tones. “Even if you were able to kill me, it’s probably too late anyway. You can search, but you won’t find what you’re looking for. Everything you hold dear has probably been ripped apart by now. Keitarou is cleverer than you are, and by the time you figure out where he is, it will all be too late. Then you’ll really understand, won’t you — what it means to be fighting a war.”

Guren stared at him for a moment, dismay fluttering in his heart as he digested the implication in Haruya’s cryptic words.

Figure it out? Figure what out? Figure out where Keitarou really... but surely... surely not. Surely that’s impossible. Surely...

His eyes narrowed.

Enough wasting time. This fight is done with, and I will end it now. Maybe Kyouki-dono realised what I just have... in which case, I understand her sentiments only too well.

He drew back his weapon, gazing at Haruya pensively.

"I am sorry that I even considered negotiating with you for your life," he spoke out loud. "You said you would die here, and that suits me, too. If you will tell me nothing concrete about Keitarou, our dialogue is over. Your body may be strong, but you have misjudged Tenkyourei's native strength. I have fought with you at arm's length in the hope of discovering some useful information. Things have now changed, and, I'm afraid, our conversation has ended."

His eyes glittered slightly, though had Haruya but known it, a mixture of anxiety and the memory of his son's death had brought the Captain close to tears.

"Bankai," he murmured. "Myouon Tenkyourei."

The moment Guren spoke his Bankai's name, the blade of his sword seemed to disappear, and for a split second, a complete hush pervaded the entirety of the area. Though Guren saw Haruya's lips moving faintly, he could not make out the man's words. It was too late in any case, for there was a tremendous explosion of sound, then a sucking rush of air and energy so potent that it ripped through the entirety of the unoccupied village, obliterating the stumps and posts of the miserable dwellings to little more than dust and causing the earth beneath their feet to shake and judder, sinking and rising with the force of the sound waves. Birds that, moments earlier had been flying in the sky dropped dead like rocks to the ground, sinking into the swampy surface as it shook and undulated around them. On the ground before him, Haruya's eyes had almost bugged out of his head at the initial explosion, as the mask that had cloaked his features vaporised into white dust that disintegrated into the ether. Blood began to pour from the man's ears and nostrils, crimson tears running down his cheeks as, one by one, every blood vessel in the man's body exploded and burst, sending its contents flooding out of every available orifice. As Haruya's pores began to seep a congealed mix of Hollow-chalk and spirit blood, he let out a faint grunt, and Guren thought he saw a smile touch the now bloody lips. The impression was nothing more than a fleeting chimera, however, for the next moment Haruya's body gave a little jerk, slumping against the mud, and a thin line of red trickled from the corner of the mouth onto the soft ground beneath.

Guren eyed him impassively for a moment, then gave his weapon a tap, watching with some impatience as its extreme vibrations slowed to a complete stop. It hazed with light, returning to its ordinary katana form, and Guren thrust the weapon into its scabbard, stepping over the corpse and extending his spiritual wits to pick up any signals from the local area. At the river, he knew that his men were far enough away to have avoided the fall out from Tenkyourei's intense explosion of sound-waves, and a quick scan of the surrounding area told him that the only decaying reiatsu presence he could detect in the close vicinity was that of the man he had just defeated. Haruya's heart would have burst inside his chest with the pressure, Guren knew, but he had fallen short of exploding the whole body, reluctant to stain his haori more than was necessary. Perhaps the pristine was important to him, he pondered absently as he set off towards the river, but that was simply the Kuchiki way.

Besides, there had been no need for overkill. He was not an Endou, and he had more pressing matters on his mind. If he had interpreted Haruya's taunts correctly, it meant Keitarou was not in the Real World at all. He had been there, almost certainly, but he had left guards and decoys, distractions to occupy anyone who came investigating. As he travelled, Guren re-evaluated the sensations he had picked up from the direction of Kyouki's fight, and as he broke it down, he felt certain that his neighbour had been fighting a creature similar to the one he had encountered. Haruya had called it "Moe", he remembered, and he had also mentioned a sister, killed, almost certainly, by one of the other Captains in a similar confrontation.

Keitarou knew that we would send forces here looking for him, and he took us at our word, planning a welcome for us.

Guren's eyes narrowed in anger, and he clenched and unclenched his fists.

We've wasted who knows how much time. Seireitei is Keitarou's target, and Seireitei is undoubtedly where he now is. That means Seireitei is where we ought to be.

"Taichou!"

As he emerged along the river-bank, Shirogane hurried to greet him, bowing his head in wary obeissance, and Guren sighed, pushing stray strands of hair out of his face.

"Is everyone here?" was all he said, however, and Shirogane nodded, raising quizzical eyes to his uncle. He did not speak the question the older man knew was burning on his lips, and Guren was glad. for he felt certain there was no time to discuss what had occurred in the muddy village.

"Taichou, Shiketsu-dono was here," Fortunately, Shirogane was perceptive enough to understand his Captain's urgency, leaving the matter alone. "Nagesu-sama and Midori-sama have made a discovery and they want us to return to base camp. He didn't give details, because he was heading direct to report the message to Fifth, but it sounded important. I had Ryuu get everyone chivvied and ready to move, and so we're awaiting your orders to decamp."

"Even the wounded?"

"Yes, sir. We've made provision, and I don't believe any lives are in imminent danger."

"Then we return to the river, and, I trust, open the Gate." Guren said bleakly, turning his gaze in the direction he knew the Senkaimon lay. "We go back to Seireitei, Shirogane. Unless I miss my guess, what we're looking for has slipped our attention and has invaded our home... and we can waste no time in getting back to put things right."

"It's no use."

Nagesu took a pace back, gazing hopelessly at the feeble sparks of spiritual energy that prickled across the atmosphere before him. Though he had used the Senkaimon many times before, it was the first time that it had refused to respond to Sekizanha's command to unlock, and as more time passed, the Third Division Captain was feeling an increasing sense of unease.

"What do you mean, no use?" Midori cast him a sharp glance, concern in her own golden eyes. "I thought you said that this was the easiest pathway back to Seireitei that existed in the Real World? It connects directly to Third Division's managed portal, doesn't it? Why wouldn't it open?"

"It's a good question," Nagesu sighed, running his fingers through his messy fair hair. "I don't have an immediate answer, at least not one that will suffice. This is exactly as you say, Midori-dono. I've been using this Gate for a long time, and it was the pathway between here and the Real World where I first consolidated and stabilised the scientific principles needed to allow so much more interdimensional travel. Of all the Gates dotted all over Seireitei, this one has never let me down. However, last time I used it... last time Third used it..."

He trailed off, his gaze drifting to the malformed mountain, and Midori groaned, clapping her hand to her head.

"Great," she muttered. "Are you saying that something in your Bankai earthquake did some permanent damage on this side of the pathway?"

"I didn't think so," Nagesu admitted, running his fingers speculatively through the air with a sigh. "I managed to open it, and though I was battered and exhausted when I got back to Seireitei, I don't remember there being any particular problems. We got here safely, and with so many officers, if there had been a rip or a tear in the Gate's control, it would've been apparent long before this. Besides, Shiketsu and Yunosuke and I went over the whole thing with a fine tooth comb in the days before we left. All the readings were normal and the Dangai was as stable as it's ever been for this kind of a transfer."

"Dangai is never stable," Midori said darkly. "I might not know much science, Nagesu-dono, but I do know about that place. The Shihouin know things that are dark, shady and secret, and probably a good deal about the lost souls that are rumoured to haunt them. Maybe one of the long discarded dead was woken up by our tramping here and decided to put a spanner in the works — stranger things have happened."

"With all respect, Midori-dono, I do not believe in ghosts in the Dangai," Nagesu's tone was edged with censure, and he pushed his spectacles back up his nose, trying to hide his growing apprehension. "Your family, and mine, and others in Seireitei may once have committed the less than savoury act of throwing convicted felons into the Dangai to rot and die, but that was a long time ago. Since the proper development of useful Senkaimon technology, that practice has been terminated — and besides, no soul, living or dead, would manage to survive in that place for long. There are no remains of those unfortunate convicts — and I am a scientist, not a witch doctor looking to commune with the long deceased."

"An ironic stance for a shinigami," Midori said acidly. "I wasn't meaning it in the way you took it, though. I was wondering at the possibility of a former Onmitsukidou lurking around these parts, waiting to sabotage our mission — such dead folk become a nuisance when they refuse to remain dead."

"Suzuki Naoto?" Nagesu looked stunned, and Midori shrugged.

"Kai's men haven't found him," she said matter-of-factly. "We sent agents to the village where his widow lived, but she's packed up and gone, too, with no forwarding address. Her home is cleared out, her wares and all evidence of her vanished. It's like she didn't exist. Almost certainly she was complicit in whatever he was doing, and may still be — but they're long outside of Shihouin jurisdiction now, if they were ever truly in it. The village they come from straddles your land and mine and has open borders because of trade... and I believe that the dead can walk again — in certain circumstances."

“I still think it unlikely,” Nagesu pursed his lips. “I grant that Suzuki Naoto is a loose cannon, but I stand by my belief that nobody would be able to survive in the Dangai for long enough to properly destabilise the Gate from this end. The odds are very low, and besides, Sekizanha says the Gate here isn’t broken. It simply won’t open. It won’t form a connection.”

“So something’s wrong with the Gate in Seireitei, not this one at all?” Midori looked alarmed, and Nagesu chewed on his lip.

“I’m beginning to fear so,” he admitted. “Mareiko’s forces are meant to be guarding it, and the Third in general, so I had trusted all would be well — even if there was some technical glitch, she’s a far more competent scientist than most of the men I’ve brought with me here, and can probably fashion a fix that I would take days to think of in a much quicker time. It shouldn’t be a problem, since the Gate was fine when we left through it... but...”

“Gates can be sabotaged,” Midori said bluntly, and Nagesu looked horrified.

“Are you suggesting Mareiko sabotaged my Gate?” he demanded, and Midori snorted, shaking her head.

“Nagesu-sama, for someone who’s done so much good for spirit science in Seireitei, you’re being impossibly dense right now,” she retorted. “I wasn’t saying anything of the sort. Whether Sekime is there or not is probably irrelevant. I’m not even thinking about who you left in charge of your Division. I’m thinking about the person from whom you essentially stole the designs for the Gate in the first place — the person whose research made all of this travel possible, and the person who is, quite conspicuously, not in the middle of the Real World where he laid his trail. We already discussed the possibility he was elsewhere. We talked about Rukongai. The Spiritless Zone, even. Well, now I’m tabling a new suggestion. I’m going to hazard a guess that the man we’re seeking, the exile Keitarou, your cousin and the man responsible for the deaths of too many innocent people is currently setting up home inside your vacated Division. Sekime may be dead. Twelfth may have been decimated. Keitarou’s sword is a Bankai-level weapon that I doubt anyone in that Division would be able to counteract. We’re talking about a weapon which manipulated Endou Shouichi to take his own life, and Ukitake Juushirou to attack his best friend with the intention of killing him. Even if that is tempered by the fact Juushirou was a student at the time, I’m sure I’m not the only one who’s heard the rumour that, one day, Sougyo no Kotowari might rival Kinnya-sama’s Raiurei. As for Shouichi-dono, foul as I found his personality, I would never have second guessed his strength. Given the track record, I would not hesitate for one second in suspecting Keitarou'd do the same again to anyone who happened to be in his way — and we need to open this Gate and get back there, before he can hurt anyone else.”

Nagesu was silent for a moment, then, slowly, he shook his head.

“Everything you say is true, and I acknowledge it,” he said helplessly. “I’m not as dense as you think — I had thought along those lines myself, but was unwilling to voice such things aloud. Shiketsu said that Kyouki-nee was bringing injured men. Ryuusei-dono’s condition may be critical. We came here on my information and my guidance and it may have been a flawed judgement... but even if all those fears are true, I can’t open the Gate. Whether it be sabotage or something else, our way is blocked. If Sekizanha can’t open it, no other weapon can. It’s locked to us and we can’t go through.”

“Nagesu!”

Kyouki’s voice broke across the clearing at that moment, and both Nagesu and Midori turned, seeing their comrade materialise in a flurry of shunpo, a bloody, bandaged figure clasped in her arms. Though Ryuusei was a grown man of substantial height and build, Kyouki was strong in her own right, and as she laid him down on the ground, Nagesu could see for himself the severity of the man’s injury.

“His arm...” he murmured, and Midori’s brows knitted together in consternation.

“Nagesu, get the gate open! Get it open right now!” Kyouki made no attempt to leave her son, bellowing her orders across the space between them. “Ryuusei and I are going back. The rest of you can do as you please, but Shiketsu said that provision would be made. We’re going back, so get that damn Gate up and running.”

“I’m sorry, Kyouki-dono, but nobody is going back right at the moment,” Nagesu shook his head, and overhearing this, Shiketsu hurried forward, bowing his head hastily towards his father.

“Taichou, please. Ryuusei’s injury... please... open the Gate!”

“No, you don’t understand,” Nagesu rested his hand lightly on his son’s shoulder, raising his gaze to meet the incredulous Kyouki’s from across the grass. “Kyouki-dono, I’m sorry. I’ve tried to open the Gate. Midori-dono and I have just been discussing the problem at hand.”

“Problem? What problem?” Kyouki’s expression become one of alarm, and Nagesu hesitated, then let out a heavy sigh.

“Something is blocking the Gate from opening,” Before he could find the right words, Midori spoke up, her words succinct and clear and her voice carrying across all of the gathering shinigami. “There’s no going back to Seireitei — at least, not through this portal.”

“Not going back?” Shiketsu’s face drained of all colour for the second time that day, and Nagesu saw a mixture of emotions cross Kyouki’s features — fear, rage, frustration, and ultimately, disbelief. In a moment she was beside him, her bloodstained hands grasping the collar of his hakamashita and giving him a short, sharp shake

“I thought you said that this Gate was the most stable in all of Seireitei,” she spoke in low tones, suppressed and trembling as she fought her rising emotions. “Now my son is injured, and may be dying. He needs emergency care, and you say we can’t go back? What are we meant to do, stay here? Are you going to make me watch my son die, Nagesu, because you forgot to bring your key?”

“More likely this is Keitarou’s work,” As Nagesu tried to muster a reply, Guren’s voice cut across the conversation, and there was a gentle ripple of spirit power as he, followed in dribs and drabs by the other members of the Sixth Division materialised on the edge of the campsite. He strode towards them, haori flapping in the gentle breeze, and pausing a few feet from where the two Captains stood.

“Keitarou is in Seireitei,” he said frankly. “There’s no doubt in my mind that’s where he is. The ingrate I killed more or less told me so. If the Gate is blocked, then we will just have to find or fashion another. There isn’t time for emotional outpourings. This is a war and we need to be fighting in it.”

“Guren-sama, my son...” Kyouki began, and Nagesu saw storm-clouds settling in Guren’s slate grey eyes.

“My only son was murdered on the orders of that man twenty six years ago,” he spoke softly, but every word seemed to penetrate right through to the bone, and despite himself, Nagesu shivered, feeling Kyouki’s fingers loosen from his clothing. “More than anyone here, Kyouki-dono, I understand what he can do to families. I can see from here that Ryuusei is hurt, and that it is a bad wound. But your son is not dead, nor can I imagine he has any intention of dying.”

His gaze flitted towards Shirogane, who gave a quick salute, disappearing into shunpo and reappearing at the injured man’s side.

“Well?” The Kuchiki Captain’s question was cryptic, but Shirogane seemed to understand what he wanted to know, for he nodded his head. Guren, apparently satisfied, turned back to the indignant Kyouki.

“My Vice Captain is not a healer, but his cousin, Edogawa Mitsuki, is,” he said softly. “Shirogane decided, of his own accord, to undertake some basic training with her before her deployment to the Rukon, and, later, studied healing Kidou with the Fourth Division in order that he could apply it where and when it was needed among the wounded of the Sixth. I have never yet had cause to utilise that training, but Shirogane understands better than even I do the pain of being present and unable to save a kinsman with whom he shared a bond. For that reason, I have every faith that you can entrust Ryuusei to his care. He will not let your son die. You have my word.”

“Kyouki-sama, Shiketsu-sama also asked me to help, if I could,” Yunosuke got hesitantly to his feet. “I’m not a healer, either, but my closest friend is, and he taught me enough to get by. With Shirogane-dono’s help, I’m sure we can keep Ryuusei-dono stable until the Gate is fixed and ready to open.”

“A Kuchiki and an Urahara coming to the rescue of a Shiba,” Nagesu murmured, more to himself than to any of his companions, but Midori turned to gaze at him, a thoughtful look in her clever eyes. “The future is indeed a different world from the one Keitarou imagines.”

“Perhaps, but I’d still rather get him somewhere safe,” Kyouki had calmed somewhat, but there was still an agitation to her aura that she could not quite conceal. “Very well, Guren-sama. Nagesu. I will entrust my son’s life to your men, but you had better hope that the confidence you have in them is merited. I made a promise to myself that I would not let my son die here and I meant it.”

“A promise is a promise, and Kuchiki do not break promises,” Guren said simply. “In the meantime, our more pressing concern is with the Gate. Can it be fixed?”

“From this end? Probably not,” Nagesu clicked his tongue against his teeth as he considered. “The problem is at the other end. Whether it be a technical glitch or something more sinister, I can’t reach out to find out from here. We’re too far away, and there’s too much Dangai inbetween.”

“So the question is, how are we going to get home?” Midori interjected. “All this mutual healing is very nice and positive and I fully approve, but the reality is that both Yunosuke and Shirogane-dono are makeshift at best. I’ve seen injuries like Ryuusei-dono’s before, and they’re fifty-fifty. If the bleeding’s been stopped, which it looks like it has, maybe seventy-thirty, but it's not necessarily about the wound. It's shock and infection that does it."

"Midori-dono, is that really appropriate?" Guren shot Midori a dark look, and Midori shrugged apologetically.

"It's the reality. I don't want him to die, but I don't believe in sugar-coating," she said frankly. "I don't want anyone to lose sight of the real problem here. If this Gate can't be fixed, how are we getting back? If Keitarou is running rampant around Seireitei, what are we going to do to stop him?"

Nagesu hesitated for a moment, then his expression hardened, and he nodded his head resolutely.

"We're going to go back and slit his throat, if that's what it takes," he said firmly, and Kyouki started, staring at Nagesu in disbelief.

"Nagesu? Don't make promises you can't keep — if the Gate is broken, how..."

"We'll go through the other Gate," Nagesu said simply. Immediately there was uproar.

"Another Gate?" Shiketsu, who had been doing his best to make himself invisible during the Captains' angry dispute spoke up now, casting his father a confused look. "But there isn't another... I mean we don't..."

"No, not our Gate," Nagesu shook his head, turning to gesture towards the neatly bound piles of documents and volumes that littered the landscape. "There isn't time to explain clearly now, but Midori-dono and I discovered some less than pleasant evidence in that mountain. Keitarou was undoubtedly behind those masked monsters we all apparently saw and fought, but he didn't create them. That — and from the bits I read, a whole lot more — was the province of another kinsman of mine, a man called Kusakawa Daigo. His son was Kusakawa Shougo, the former Captain of the Twelfth — and it looks as though he continued that research, illegally and in secret."

"You said there wasn't time to explain clearly," Kyouki snapped impatiently. "We need a Gate, not a history lesson. So Shougo-dono was doing some things he shouldn't — he's been dead a quarter of a century, so how does that help us now?"

"Simple," Nagesu smiled, turning to gaze at the slopes of the mountain. "Shougo-dono conducted experiments here, but he did so without us knowing. So did his Father. That means that, in order to sneak around at their own convenience, they'd need a means of travelling from here to Seireitei without being caught. Third Division's Senkaimon might be broken or barred, but it's not the only option. Daigo-dono once worked under my Uncle Keitsune, Keitarou's father, who was the one who initially developed Senkaimon technology in happier days. Undoubtedly Daigo-dono and his son had the science and chose to exploit that fact to their own advantage. Shougo-dono must've therefore had his own Senkaimon, and since he was killed unexpectedly in the Rukon, it's highly unlikely that he ever shut it down."

"Which means that, somewhere in this area, there's a Senkaimon just waiting to be opened?" Guren's eyes widened, and Nagesu nodded.

"Exactly that," he agreed. "Daigo-dono's lab was within the volcano, so it's probable that such a Gate would be in this vicinity. Maybe hidden inside the mountain itself. Moreover, it's highly likely that it connects to the disused Gate exit somewhere near the Twelfth. Twelfth were originally quite a nomadic Division, and if Shougo had built a new Gate, it would've been looked on suspiciously if he had failed to connect it to the overall route map. More to the point, getting clearance for new Gates when so much building was still to be done would've aroused people's suspicions. It would also have been too inconvenient for him to keep using a Gate at the Kusakawa manor — he had no wife or children, so constantly going back home when Twelfth were often stationed far from Third District would've looked suspicious. He would've needed another option, and so he probably gambled on an existing Gate that — although part of the official route network, clearly saw little regular usage. The Gate between Twelfth and Thirteenth has since been erased from plans and is no longer in service, but it is operational, because Keitarou used it to have Kotetsu Tenichi abducted. The layout of Inner Seireitei has changed substantially since the establishment of proper, separate barracks, and it may be that, in Shougo-dono's day, it would've been difficult to see anyone using that particular portal from the main street. This is all only hypothesis, but if I'm correct, there ought to be a Senkaimon here, active and undamaged, which is already honed in on that particular location. The Gate outside Twelfth may have been manipulated by Keitarou to go to Rukongai or wherever he felt it necessary to go — but there's a good chance that the one here has been left alone. Keitarou's always had his own Gates — our technology is based largely on his science. He used the one by Twelfth to snare the Kotetsu boy, and so he had to take a risk on using our openings, not his own, but in the case of the one here, I doubt he could be certain whether we knew of it and whether it was being monitored... especially since he saw Third Division members lurking around this vicinity. Maybe we knew, maybe we didn't... safer to use his own just in case. I imagine that means Shougo-dono's Gate is still here, somewhere, waiting for us to dig it out. Every man not currently injured or occupied should be dispatched to begin searching immediately. The sooner we find it, the sooner we can go home — and the sooner we can put this business to rights."

"At last, an action plan," relief glittered in Kyouki's eyes, and she nodded, Gekkoushin already half-drawn from its sheath. "If we're all looking, it surely can't take that long. Let's go."

Author's Note: Swords

Kyouki's sword was first introduced in Third Chronicle, with its Day Moon and Night Moon powers. Then, Kyouki did not possess Bankai, but now, like Nagesu, she does. Her Bankai release is Gekkoushin Nisshoku. Gekkoushin 月光神 means "Moonlight Goddess", and Nisshoku 日食 is the word in Japanese for an eclipse in which the moon covers the sun. The crossbow like release of her blade in Bankai has the command Tsukiya 月矢, or "Moon Arrow." Gekkoushin's Bankai is very intense, but has its limitations. It cannot follow her target, it is fixed in the area where she released it, and spreads only as far as her eyes can see, so cannot be fired around corners. That is why the clearing was the perfect place to release it, because it was a confined area she could see clearly. However, had Moe fled into the woods, he would've once more broken through into the light. The Eclipse also has the limitation of Kyouki's focus and concentration. She cannot usually hold it — yet — for more than one release of the Tsukiya attack. Like Nagesu, she is still inexperienced with her Bankai.

And, finally, Guren. I refused to reveal Guren's Zanpakutou in Fourth Maki, much to the annoyance of a few people. Now, finally, at last, here it is — probably for the first and the last time.

Guren's zanpakutou name is 天響霊 Tenkyourei (Heaven's echoing spirit). His release command Hibike 響け means "resonate" or 'echo'. Yes, Guren's sword is related to sound. But probably that was clear from the last chapter. His bankai name is Myouon Tenkyourei 妙音天響霊. In this context, I think you can interpret "Myouon" as "blessed sound" and I guess it's pretty obvious what it can do. The "rei" at the end is the same as at the end of his father's sword, Taiyourei, and his uncle's, Raiurei. It is possible that Ribari's sword would also have inherited this tag, as a direct continuation of Senaya's main line. For Ryuu and Shirogane, whose parents did not have zanpakutou, the line was broken. The same is true, of course, for Kinnya's daughter Raiko, who never had the opportunity to raise a sword. Guren is, therefore, the only one who could inherit the “rei” (spirit) tag on the name of his sword. I did it this way to underscore the fact that the old line ends with Guren, and Shirogane will be the beginning of a new line, which leads directly to modern canon. Byakuya’s petal-shattering Senbonzakura is a direct descendant of Shirogane’s Ginkyoujiki. It’s no accident that Shirogane has the name he has, considering that his name means “white gold”, or “silver”. The first character of Byakuya’s name is, of course, white, whilst his grandfather, Ginrei, begins his name with “silver”.

Guren was one of the shinigami already in possession of Bankai at the beginning of Second Manuscript. He is not new to his sword’s power, and it is not a gentle power. It really wouldn’t have been suitable to use it at the site of Seiren’s crumbling manor house in Fourth Maki.

Kind of makes me wonder what Kinnya and Senaya were like in Bankai — but since I won’t ever have cause to write about it, I guess it doesn’t much matter ;)

While Ryuu and Shirogane have the potential to move beyond their current level, till either of them have Bankai, neither of them can match Guren’s scary in the field ;)

The Vaizard and their place in Canon.

Here endeth the involvement of the Kamen no Gunzei, bar the dissecting. I hope they have been worth their appearance time. It is from their existence and the mutation of Anabomi Seizuku that Seireitei develops a law for the disposal of Hollowfied souls, a law which survives down to the Pendulum age, and which Shinji and the other Vaizards consequently fall foul of when Central 46 condemn them to be destroyed. Of course, at some point between Sukuse and now, the notes from Kusakawa Daigo, Kusakawa Shougo and Keitarou himself become dispersed and lost, bits of them falling into Kisuke’s hands, and other bits into Aizen Sousuke’s. And so the illegal studies, and the term, “Kamen no Gunzei”, later to be glossed as “Vaizaado”, ultimately reemerge. It’s too much to me for it to be a complete coincidence that both Sousuke and Kisuke are doing the same kind of research at the same time. It’s far more likely that there was an older trigger point that inspired both of them, which is the main reason why I chose to involve Vaizard in Meifu and Sukuse. At this point, it is impossible to manage Hollow powers in a shinigami soul, and so the only option is to destroy them. However, Aki, Moe and Haruya provide the hope that such control is possible — and therefore, the interest in future generations of shinigami scientists to perfect the break between one set of power and the other, finally resulting in Shinji’s group — and, perhaps, Tousen Kaname. Ultimately, it was not Aizen Keitarou who developed the blueprint for manageable Vaizard powers — but Kusakawa Daigo, an Urahara ;).

67. Aftermath

Chapter Sixty Five: Aftermath

The world was shattering into tiny pieces.

Like a mosaic crumbling into tiny grains of sand, the vivid images fragmented and broke away, leaving an empty, black and white void that flickered in and out of range. From the colours and revelations of the Rukon, Juushirou suddenly found himself in a dark tunnel, the walls juddering and closing in around him as they tried to bury him in their silent, hollow world. It was like the inside of a Senkaimon, he realised dully, yet at the same time, he knew it was not. The walls that surrounded him were as dead as stone, yet their undulating movements belied their stoic appearance. Was it him that was shaking? Juushirou put a hand out to touch them, but to his dismay, his fingers brushed right through, like he was touching a ghost. Spectral fingers reached out from nowhere to brush against his, and he raised his gaze in alarm, meeting two sad brown eyes staring at him from deep within the wall. The figure was barely visible, the outlines of his face like grooves in the intransient stone, but Juushirou could make out the thin line of his features, and he knew he had seen the individual before. The young man's lips moved, and although Juushirou could not hear any sounds, he realised that the ghost was saying his name. The next moment he was gone, and the wall lit up in a sudden burst of eerie blue flame.

Juushirou let out an exclamation, drawing his hand back, and as he did, something seared across his palm, burning into his skin and causing a deep, scorching pain to run through the whole of his nervous system. He stumbled, falling backwards onto the ground, only to find there was no ground, and he was falling, down, down, down into a deep, shadowy chasm. He opened his mouth to scream for help, but no sound came out, his vocal chords spasming and choking off the words he wanted to say. The burns on his fingers blistered and began to bleed, but at the same time, the pain he had felt so sharply moments before had begun to numb and fade away. The digits were growing black, he realised with a jolt, like charcoal ready to break away into fragments of ash. It didn't seem real, and then, just as he thought he was going to be falling forever, he landed with a bump, the crack of stone beneath his spine reawakening every one of his pain reflexes.

He opened his eyes, momentarily dazzled by the light of the sun and he raised his hand to shield his gaze, disorientated. His fingers were no longer burned, he noticed, and, as his vision came back into focus, he knew he was back in the barracks of Thirteenth Division. Already the tunnel and the deep, dark chasm were growing fainter in his memory, like a dream he could not properly draw to mind, but his heart was still pounding in his chest and he knew that it had been more than imagination.

He had seen Atsushi and Shougo, fighting in the Rukon. He had heard their conversation, and the true depths of Shougo's deception, but it was not this that had him scrambling hurriedly to his feet, anxiety burning in his hazel eyes. The potency of the earlier images was now all he could think about. He knew, beyond a shadow of a doubt, what had caused the potent hallucination, and whose eyes it had been, staring at him so desperately out of the darkness of the wall.

Kohaku.

Though his head still ached and span, Juushirou pushed the discomfort aside, assessing his surroundings in sudden panic. Where was the boy? He had been here... no, now he remembered. Keitarou had taken him. Kohaku had gone with his father in order to prevent Thirteenth being attacked, but the strange sensation that had momentarily overpowered him had definitely come from his waif and stray. Had Keitarou made him do it? He glanced around himself, noticing Naoko huddled on the ground a short distance away. She had pulled herself into a sitting position, holding her head, and Juushirou gathered his wits, realising that it had not just been him this time that had seen Kohaku's delusion, but others as well.

Last time, Koku had to touch me, before I saw the image of the Kitsune being killed. This time, he's not even here, yet whatever he did knocked me off my feet and Naoko... maybe Naoko too. Is that what he meant, when he said I had no idea what he could do?

"What the hell was that?" Naoko's blurry words confirmed his fears, and he hastened to give her a hand, hauling her to her feet. "Taichou, did you see that? Pictures... Minaichi-taichou fighting someone called Kusakawa, and before that... a man who became a Hollow?"

"Sakanoue Heiji," Juushirou's expression became grim, fear suddenly surrounding his heart. 'Naoko, it's Koku. Don't ask me how I know that,' as Naoko shot him a startled look, "just trust me that I do. I don't know what's happened, but I don't imagine it can be considered good. If it laid you and I out, there's every possibility it's laid others on the ground, too. We've kept a physical attack from our borders, but one like this..."

"You're saying that kid pumped some hallucinogenic power at us?" Naoko demanded. "Taichou, you let him go with Keitarou — don't you think its time we did something about it?"

"We're going to," Juushirou said grimly. "At least, no. I'm going to. You're going to stay here with Enishi, and make sure nobody gets hurt. Before I do, though, I want to make sure nobody is already hurt. You seem all right... and I'm fine, but given that it's Keitarou, I'm taking no chances. You and I are immune to Chudokuga, but if he's acting through his son, he might have done harm elsewhere."

"You think Keitarou's using the boy?" Naoko's eyes became slits, and she nodded. "I suppose that makes sense, since he came here for Koku. I don't understand what it is about that kid, but clearly you do. Since you're my Captain, I guess for now that'll have to be good enough — though I'll remind you later, if we have time, that you usually run this Division based on sharing important information with Houjou and I. I'm not splitting hairs over hierarchy, but when it's something that can knock us off our feet with one blast... and besides, what did we even see? Was any of that true? Was it a lie? What was it?"

"I think it was true," Juushirou admitted, already halfway across the cobbles towards the main doorway, and Naoko sighed, but hurried to join him. "If it was Koku, Naoko, I'm certain it was true. But if it was Keitarou, I don't know. Right now, more important is to assess the damage and to find the boy. If he's acting under Keitarou's impulses, we need to take him into our custody and prevent Keitarou from doing any more damage. I don't believe that's possible, but it may be that my information is inaccurate and I can't take chances. If he's acting on his own, we need to find him and work out what he's doing and why he's doing it. Either way, letting him roam loose is too risky, not now it's clear he's stronger and capable of more than any of us realised. We need to find him and bring him back here, since I'm starting to think this battle will be won or lost on who has custody of that boy."

"That sounds like a huge over-exaggeration, but like I said, you're my Captain, even when you say mad things I don't understand," Naoko sighed again, yanking open the door of the Division barracks. "Houjou-kun! Makoto? Kirio! Kira? Anyone alive in here?"

"We're about hanging on," Enishi emerged from the back of the building, giving his head a rub and then shrugging his shoulders.

“Couple of the recruits are out for the count, and there are a few dizzy heads back here, but no fatalities. What was that, Taichou? Some kind of psychic attack or something?”

“Something like that,” Juushirou nodded. “I can’t guarantee whether or not it will happen again, but I intend to head out and see if I can make sure it doesn’t. Naoko will explain to you the rest, but you’re in charge — between the pair of you, I want you to keep everyone calm and try and settle them down. I don’t know if we’re going to come under a physical attack, but if this is Keitarou’s work, it’s a possibility.”

“Understood,” Enishi agreed. “Tell you the truth, what we saw is bothering the hell out of me, especially since everyone seems to have seen the same thing. Atsushi-dono is a friend of my father’s, and a kinsman, even if I don’t see eye to eye with the man — and seeing stuff like that, well, it messes with your head.”

“Which is probably what it’s meant to do,” Naoko interjected succinctly. “Put it on the back-burner for now, Houjou-kun. Taichou wants to find our missing stray. He’s gone AWOL, and Taichou thinks it’d be a good idea if we bring him back.”

“I’m going to pretend I understand the orders, and just obey them right now. My head doesn’t really want to reason it out beyond that,” Enishi owned. “If that’s what you want, Ukitake, then Shikibu and I will hold the fort.”

“If they’re not too dazed, I’ll take Kirio and Makoto with me,” Juushirou decided. “Kirio, because she has a rapport with the boy, and Makoto, because he’s strong and usually not given to sudden panics. Koku’s not well and not healed, and he might not be able to walk. If there are three of us, that gives us a better chance of defending ourselves — and him, when we happen to track him down.”

“You really do think this kid is important, don’t you?” Enishi realised, and Juushirou nodded.

“Like I said, having custody of him suddenly seems very important indeed,” he agreed grimly. “Listen, Enishi. I don’t expect to meet trouble, but it might come to meet me. I can take care of myself, and if necessary, I’ll send Kirio and Makoto back with or without the boy, I won’t let them come to harm. Till I come back, you’re to hold the fort here and nobody is to leave here until there’s some word from Kai. Also, I want you to make sure Izumi keeps her head down. She’s not to venture out from hiding on any account. Keep Ketsui with her, and make sure she understands how dangerous this whole situation is.

Keitarou is the enemy and he has tried to kill her brother once already — but he doesn't seem to know about her and I'm hoping to keep it that way. Last thing we need is any additional complications."

"Yes, because everything is so smooth and problem-free right now," Naoko muttered. "All right, instructions are accepted, if not entirely understood. Houjou, lets go chivvy Kirio and Makoto, and make some semblance of order out of the rest."

"Right behind you," Enishi assured her. As she disappeared into the gloom, he turned to follow, then paused, glancing back at his Captain pensively.

"Be careful," he said gruffly. "If it's Keitarou, we know he'll try and take you out. You can take him down, if you have to. Even if you don't want to, Ukitake, it might be best if you do."

"I'd already thought about that," Juushirou said simply. "I'll come back in one piece, Enishi, you can count on that. I'll come back with Koku, if I can... whatever it takes to get to him. My priority is Thirteenth's safety, though — I won't jeopardise that. If Keitarou attacks here, send me a message. I'll come back directly, and he'll wish I hadn't. All right?"

"All right," Enishi's broad features cleared and he looked relieved. "You sound as though you've made your mind up, so I guess I'm saluting and getting down to business."

"I guess so," Juushirou nodded. "Don't worry, Enishi. This time, Keitarou is not going to escape from Seireitei alive. Too much is at stake — this time, he's not getting away, no matter what."

For a moment Atsushi had been flailing and lost, submerged in the cruel memories that had refused to release him from their grasp, and then he was back in his office, the hard walls and floor reassuring to his shaking body as he fought to regain control.

His eyes were closed — when had he closed them? He could not remember, but when he opened them, he quickly wished that he had not. The potent images still burned into his thoughts had not just been a flashback of vivid recollection, regrets flashing before his eyes in the moments before his death. On the contrary, they had been something else, and, as his dazed eyes rested on Mareiko's face, he knew they had also been seen by someone else. Tears of horror and disbelief glittered against his companion's lashes, the sword which had been held so resolutely to his throat moments before now shaking and drawing back, as though the Twelfth Division Captain no longer knew how she was there or what she had come for.

Her skin was pale, paler even than the day he had first seen her following the return from Rukongai. On that day she had lain still and silent, swathed in bandages on one of Retsu's many pallet beds. He had dismissed the attentive healers and discharged himself from Fourth's care as soon as he had been able to stand, and as he eyed at his comrade's chalky complexion now, he remembered the pain and dizziness of that day, stumbling through unfamiliar halls and corridors, taking wrong turns and fighting through his discomfort to make sure she was all right. He had been far from well, but he had had to see her, Shougo's taunting words resonating in his dreams and granting him no relief. Her face had been scratched and bruised, but superficially, and he recalled how he had pressed his hands to the glass of the door, knowing that from that point on, more than just physical divides would separate them. That same pane of glass seemed to have slipped between them again now, for though Mareiko still held her sword, the killing intent he had felt in her aura had all but gone.

"Atsushi... kun?"

The word was uncertain and confused, then the next moment her entire expression twitched into a mask of disbelief and agitation, and she grasped at her hair, waving the weapon towards him without any real understanding of what she was doing.

"What did you do?" she exclaimed. "What did you do!? What did you put into my head? What are you trying to do to me! You won't... you can't..."

Her voice trailed off, and at the pain in her words Atsushi flinched, half tempted to grab the wildly waving weapon and pull it through his body himself. All the things he had fought to do and protect had now been laid bare, not just inside his own mind, but inside the one person in Seireitei who still mattered to him. Mareiko had never been further from him emotionally than she was at that moment, and though he knew that he could reach out physically and touch her... comfort her, even... his arms remained rooted to his sides.

He was the killer of her Captain, a man who had always held the biggest place in Mareiko's happy-go-lucky heart. The man who she had loved more than anything had betrayed her in the cruellest of fashions, and, despite all of his efforts, Atsushi had failed in his one last duty to her as her friend. He had failed to protect her from the truth of Kusakawa Shougo's betrayal.

“I didn’t do anything,” at length he found his voice, his words hoarse and his consonants sticking together as though he had to force each syllable through his vocal chords. “You had unfinished business, Mareiko. I suggest you finish it. I’m the murderer of your Captain, remember. I confessed to the crime. I’m currently unarmed... if you want to kill me, then now would be your chance.”

“What are you trying to make me do?” Mareiko demanded, her tones becoming more agitated, bordering on hysterical. “What were those pictures, Atsushi-kun? Where did they come from? They came through your eyes, your thoughts... don’t tell me you did nothing! You put some kind of spell on me, to make me see... to make me think...”

“I’m not capable of that kind of witchcraft,” Atsushi said frankly. “I don’t know who is. I’m not a scientist, nor a magician. You’re the one with the Kidou knowledge, and the scientific genius. I should be asking you for an explanation. I never invited you to see into my memories, and you shouldn’t have done. Things which are private to me are mine to deal with as I see fit — at the very least, if you intend to kill me, you should let me take such recollections to my grave.”

Mareiko shook her head, tears trickling over her lashes and down her pale cheeks.

“Taichou would never have said those things,” she murmured. “You’re lying to me. Lying! They’re not real! None of it! I don’t care what you say, you must have... somehow, you... you... you...”

Again, words failed her, and to Atsushi’s surprise and dismay, she crumpled to her knees, her sword slipping from her hold and clattering onto the hard office floor, coming to rest alongside Atsushi’s own discarded weapon. Unable to maintain her composure any further, she buried her head in her arms as the tears overwhelmed her, and, as her sobs filled the small, sparsely decorated chamber, Atsushi felt his heart ache in regret one more time.

“You should have killed me sooner,” he murmured. “Maybe if you had, you wouldn’t have seen. I’m sorry, Mareiko. If I had had any power over it, I would never have let you see anything of that day. My guilt or innocence are beside the point. Making you see things that upset you was never my intention. You should’ve killed me more quickly. Then it would’ve been over, and you wouldn’t have to suffer like this.”

Mareiko raised her gaze, and Atsushi saw hopelessness in the pale eyes.

“I trusted you,” she whispered. “I trusted you as my friend and my comrade, and you always told me the truth. Why didn’t you tell me the truth this time, Atsushi-kun?”

Atsushi did not answer, but her question tore into him all the same. Despite his silence, and her own protestations, Mareiko had seen every inch of the chimera that had assuaged his own senses. Where he had relived painful memory, she had seen, for the first time, every slither of truth. It was not the shock of witnessing her Captain’s death a second time, nor the anger or fierce denial that had broken Mareiko’s composure, but the real understanding of what had occurred between the two Captains that day in the Rukon. Whatever she said, Mareiko knew what she had seen had been real, and Atsushi’s brow creased in distress.

She was there and she saw it. She saw the fight. She saw what I did. She saw enough to know that the memories were true. What power projected them between us I have no idea, but once seen, they can’t be unseen. Mareiko knows the truth, now... and neither one of us can walk away from that.

He bent to pick up his weapon, sliding it carefully into its sheath and saying a silent apology for treating it with such disrespect. Mareiko watched every move he made, but her eyes were suddenly empty, as though what she had seen had caused her to give up completely, and at the sight of it, Atsushi gritted his teeth, understanding what it was he needed to do.

I am the Captain of the Eleventh Division and protecting Seireitei is my duty. That means dealing with this disturbance... and making sure it doesn’t spread further than it must.

Flexing his fingers, he took a step or two past his companion’s huddled body, then, before she could react to him, he brought the edge of his hand sharply against a point on the back of her neck. She slumped, unconscious, and Atsushi was quick to catch her falling body, turning it over so that he could see her face. Her skin was still pale, but blotched with tears, and he sighed, pushing the stray strands of wild fair hair back from her brow.

I’m sorry, Mareiko. I’m not strong enough a person to kill you, even if it would make things easier for you, and even if you would’ve killed me. Mokizuki’s blade is stained with too much blood already, and I wouldn’t ever stain it with yours, anyway. For now, I must simply do my duty. That involves making sure you’re somewhere secure until I can find a way to put this whole thing into some kind of perspective.

He lifted his limp burden up in his arms, striding across the office and nudging the door open with the toe of his sandal. As he stepped out into the hallway, he stopped dead, dismay crossing his features yet again as he took in the sight before him. Strewn around the corridors, legs poking out of doorways and arms hung haphazardly over railings were the members of his Division, each one of them completely insensible to the world. In the midst of these was the unmistakable form of Ikata, and he paused alongside his Vice Captain's body to make sure his hated adjutant was alive. To his relief, the man was breathing, a soft snore erupting from his huge nostrils, and Atsushi sighed, slowly shaking his head. A quick check of the other officers confirmed that not a single one of them had been physically injured — and that all of them were simply sleeping, sedated by an unknown force or spell.

Atsushi glanced at Mareiko.

Not quite so unknown. But at least you didn't hurt them. Thank you, Mareiko. Your grudge was with me, but you could easily have unleashed it on my men and made things more complicated. The fact you didn't makes me grateful.

He stepped over the straggling limbs and torsos, heading along the hallway towards his own private quarters. His chamber door was locked, but he did not have any time for niceties, and, shunting Mareiko's unconscious form up more securely in his arms, he raised his right leg, giving the door several hard kicks until the panels splintered and broke away. A further shove with his shoulder and the doorway was clear enough for them to pass through, and he ducked beneath the hanging remains of the divide, stepping into his spartan quarters and moving to lay Mareiko's still body on the top of his bed. Removing his haori from his shoulders, he lay it gently over her, pausing to gaze down at her with some misgivings.

I don't want to leave you here alone, but I have no choice. Twelfth Division must have had orders today, and you derelicted them to come attack me. I need to make sure your own officers are all right — and more, what else has been happening. I couldn't sense it before, but now I can. Swirls of spirit power, and the unmistakable scent of molten metal and charred wood. As a shinigami Captain, my duty is to fight when I'm needed to defend this place from harm, and that means I can't stay here and watch over you in the way that I'd like. My Kidou is no match for yours, and even if I were to cast it to confine you in here, you'd find a way to break free. Yet staying here with you is out of the question. I trust you won't wake up too quickly. Whilst it's just between us, it doesn't need to go further.

He brushed his hand against Mokizuki's hilt, then turned to go, casting his fellow Captain one last glance before stepping over the splinters of his doorway and out into the hall beyond. A quick flashstep and he was out in the main thoroughfare, and as soon as he set foot outside Eleventh's gates, he could tell that something was seriously amiss. Everything was deathly silent, yet the unmistakeable traces of violent battle were drifting his way from further into Inner Seireitei's core, and for a moment he hesitated, unsure which direction he ought to proceed in first.

"Minaichi... taichou?"

The decision was made for him, as a dazed and drunken figure staggered out from the gates of the Twelfth, clinging desperately onto the gate-posts to prevent himself from falling headlong.

"Michihashi!" Muttering a curse, Atsushi hurried towards him, grabbing the younger man by the shoulders and meeting his gaze. "What is it? What's happened?"

"Must... find... Taichou," Aoi swallowed hard, and Atsushi thought that he might be sick, so green around the gills did he appear. "Taichou... something... wrong. Must... find. Must... stop..."

He faltered, swallowing again, and Atsushi sighed, pushing the younger Vice Captain forcibly down until he was sitting on the ground.

"You stay there, and report as clearly as you can," he instructed. "If it's your Captain you're worried about, she's fine. She took a trip to my Division, but I was able to subdue her and there's been no harm done."

"To Eleventh?" Aoi looked alarmed, colour beginning to return to his cheeks now he was no longer having to maintain an upright position of balance. He rubbed his brow, then, "Minaichi-taichou, something was possessing her. If she did anything... I mean... whatever she did... it wasn't her. I saw her... it wasn't her. Something was making her."

Atsushi's glanced back towards the Eleventh Division, and his lips thinned.

Yes. Twenty-five years of unrequited hate and resentment, boiling up inside.

Out loud he said,

"I told you, there's no harm done. Quite likely you're right, and something was controlling her. She certainly acted unlike her normal self, but she's no match for me with her damaged arm and I was able to take her into safe custody without having to hurt her. I came to make sure the Twelfth was all right — though if you're the evidence, it certainly doesn't look that way."

"I think... the others were drugged," Aoi rubbed his brow once more, and Atsushi could tell he was trying to remember. "All of them, with supplies kept locked away. Only Taichou and I have the key, but whatever made her come to you also made her drug the others. I wasn't with them, so she cast Hakufuku on me. I was out cold. Then, something woke me. I don't know what it was, or how long I was out. I saw bits of colour and light, but nothing coherent, and then I woke up in the courtyard and remembered what had happened. I looked for Taichou, but she'd gone, and I knew I had to find her before she did something she'd regret."

"The rest of Twelfth were drugged?" Atsushi remembered the Eleventh Division officers, and Aoi nodded.

"They're still flat out," he agreed. "I'm the only one... not. Minaichi-taichou, if Taichou is all right, can I..."

"I don't know that she's all right. If something was controlling her, it's hard to know whether it's stopped," Atsushi cut across him, shaking his head. "I told you, she's safe for now. You can be more helpful taking care of your squad and recovering your colour. You're a useless solder if you can't get to your feet and fight a battle, and I'm starting to realise that that's what we're in the middle of right now. First off, you can tell me what Twelfth Division were scheduled to do before your Captain was possessed?"

"Guard the Third!" Alarm flashed into Aoi's gaze and he stared up at Atsushi in clear dismay. "Minaichi-taichou, we were supposed to be guarding Third Division's Senkaimon and labs! If someone made Taichou come attack you, then that means nobody was there! What if Taichou was used as a decoy... in order to cover up something else?"

"Third Division, huh?" Atsushi's lips set in a grim line. "All right. You go back inside and nurse your fellows. Leave Third and your Captain to me. That's an order."

"Yes, sir," Aoi's eyes were anxious and doubtful, but he was quickly coming back to himself now, and Atsushi thanked his lucky stars that Mareiko's Vice Captain was quick-witted and not given to emotional reactions. For a moment he remembered the dead Sakanoue, but quickly pushed the thought aside as he watched the Twelfth Division adjutant scramble clumsily to his feet, resting against the gatepost to steady himself before disappearing back into the barracks. He could leave Twelfth now, and it appeared that, despite the intent in Mareiko's attack on him, she had not seen fit to make any further sacrifices along the way. It was like her, he reflected absently, turning away from his neighbouring Division with a sigh. Even when they had been friends, she had disliked bringing suffering to innocent individuals, often stopping to speak to frightened Plus Souls who had been left homeless by the insurgent waves of Hollowfication. At this memory, Atsushi's eyes became sad.

Rukongai changed us both, drove us apart, and built insurmountable walls between our values and our intentions from that day on. Even when you've had your sword at my throat, Mareiko, I'm still drawn to remembering the way it was before. Maybe I've been fooling myself, believing that shielding you from everything Kusakawa did would allow you to move on and heal. You've never got over his death, and the light I used to see in your eyes went out the day they told you he died. No matter how others see you, I knew a different you — and today, I saw the change clearly for myself. Yet despite how much you hated me, you didn't kill my men and you didn't kill yours. You stopped, planned, schemed and worked out a way to catch me with my guard down.

This wasn't done on the spur of the moment. Michihashi's words confirmed that to me. He thought you were being controlled, but I know better. I know you, even if the person I knew has drifted far away from me. I know the woman who Kusakawa chose as his Vice Captain, and I know she's not foolish enough to act on chance. You said you'd waited twenty five years for this opportunity, but there was no need to wait. With your Kidou skill and intelligence, you could've settled the score sooner. There are any number of ways a scientific genius could commit a murder and not put herself under any suspicion. But you didn't. You wanted to confront me. You wanted to hear my confession — or maybe... my explanation.

He faltered, turning back to glance at the Twelfth gate with new eyes.

Maybe you hoped I'd deny it. Maybe you looked for a reason... and I didn't give it. Whatever happened and however you saw my memories, I never put those things into words. However, if Michihashi is telling the truth, it's probably not just a matter between the two of us. There's reason in the lad's suggestion. You weren't possessed, Mareiko. You came to me by choice. You could've waited till your men had deployed to Third and avoided anyone seeing you, but you didn't. You actively stopped your squad from going to Third. That means you decided Third should be left undefended. And... that means that the opportunity you were waiting for... the opportunity to kill me... was a moment when you would have been able to do so under the guise of something else. You were going to kill me and blame it on the control of someone else. Someone Seireitei has been investigating... and someone who may well now be at Third.

He bit his lip, not liking the way his thoughts were heading.

Complicity with someone like Keitarou is a treasonable offence, and murdering a Captain is also punishable by death. But killing one whilst possessed by an enemy, that's different. You could reveal your true intent in front of me, because you intended me to die — but you gave Michihashi the impression you weren't acting on your own impulses, so he could act as witness for you. Which leaves me with a problem.

He turned his head in the direction of the Third Division, then back towards the Twelfth, interpreting the traces of spiritual energy as they drifted past on the breeze. Some he recognised, some he did not, but in the midst of everything was something acrid and potent, something he had smelt when he had been moving Mareiko to safer quarters.
Charred wood.

He squinted, certain that he could make out hazy smoke in the distance.

Something is going on at Third. I'm right. Mareiko abandoned her post in order to kill me, which means anything that happens there is partly my fault. I should go there, and settle it. I should go there..I should.

Still he hesitated, his mind flitting back to Mareiko's agonised expression and her tears.

Can I betray her again? If she's betrayed everyone and everything, can I stand by and... am I even considering...

The next minute, his decision was made for him, for, from the direction of the Third Division, he felt a sudden, unmistakeable flare of spiritual energy. Though the battleground was far from here, something still prickling in the air had amplified the sensation for miles around, making the release of Katen Kyoukotsu's reiryoku seem twice as oppressive, and despite himself he swallowed hard, his expression becoming one of disbelief.

Kyouraku... Shunsui? Since when has he possessed spirit power like that?

He took a step backwards, then another, then another, each moment moving further and further away from the source of the release. There was anger and darkness in the blade's release, different from that he had seen in Mareiko's eyes and heard in her accusations, yet somehow more intimidating. For the first time he realised that the lazy, lackadaisical Captain of the Eighth was more than what he seemed, and, furthermore, he was in no mood for negotiations, either with friend or foe. To intervene would be to put one's own life on the line — and as a strategist, Atsushi understood that his involvement in whatever was now beginning at Third would almost certainly be to Seireitei's detriment. Shunsui had released his limits to fight a lone battle, determined resolve in every flicker of energy. Atsushi's lips thinned, and he made up his mind, turning his back firmly on the direction of the Third and heading the other way instead, towards the hated Thirteenth. With every step he moved more quickly, eventually dropping into shunpo until he materialised outside the gates of the Captain he most resented. Enishi was standing beneath the Division's snowdrop logo, and at the sight of him, he let out an exclamation, almost bashing his head on the base of the sign in his surprise.

"Atsushi-dono!" he exclaimed, and there was something in his eyes which made the Eleventh Captain deeply uneasy. Though he had never considered the other man perceptive, in that instant he felt as though Enishi was looking right through him, and he bristled, instinctively tensing.

"Stop standing around gawping at me like you don't have anything else to do!" he exclaimed, his words impatient. "I want your Captain! I want him now!"

"Taichou isn't here, sir," With a gargantuan effort, Enishi recovered himself, offering an apologetic look. "We've had some things happen... he's left the barracks and I don't know how long before he'll be back. He left me in charge in his absence."

Of all the bitter ironies.

Atsushi stared in sudden resentment at the taller man, remembering how he had snubbed the Eleventh's Vice Captancy in favour of joining Ukitake's District Division. A moment of silence passed between them, then Enishi scratched his head, offering an awkward smile.

"I could take a message," he hazarded, and Atsushi sighed, shaking his head in resignation.

"No time," he said briskly. "You'll have to do. I want some people from Thirteenth and I want them now. Listen to me carefully, and don't let it fall out of those flapping ears of yours, because what I say is important."

"Yes, sir, I'm listening," Enishi looked startled, but he nodded. "But Taichou said we weren't to leave..."

"Eleventh and Twelfth Division have been attacked," Atsushi cut across him impatiently. "Drugged, or laid out unconscious with Kidou. Michihashi is a drunken zombie who ought not be let out of his barracks if he doesn't want to get trampled, at least not while he can't walk straight. He's no use whatsoever, so I sent him inside to sober up. The rest of his squad — and mine, including that useless lump Ikata — are still lost to the world."

"What?" Enishi's vague confusion vanished in an instant, consternation crossing his features. "But... how..."

Atsushi offered him a flinty smile.

"You can take it as read that it wasn't a part of normal drill," he said waspishly. "A hostile force took control of Sekime-taichou and caused her to render her men and mine unconscious, before she made an attempt on my life. I overpowered the woman and laid her in my quarters out of harm's way, but I can't guarantee that she won't wake up and I don't know what the person at the controls might try to do with her next. Sekime's not a fighter, not with that damaged arm, but I don't want this to become a bigger incident, especially since there's clearly been combat elsewhere. Here, however, seems so far unaffected. Either invading rebels consider Thirteenth an unattractive proposition, or they've seen the lack of provisions and think they've already raided it. Whichever it happens to be, I decided to take advantage. Since my squad and Twelfth are both out of commission, I want people from Thirteenth to come help put things to rights."

Enishi's eyes narrowed slightly, then he turned, poking his head back into the division.

"Shikibu!" he bellowed, and moments later the red-head emerged, slightly dishevelled but as quick off the mark as ever. She too shot Atsushi an odd look, sending that same sense of unease through his body, but she said nothing, casting her Vice Captain a quizzical glance.

"You yelled?" she asked softly, and Enishi nodded.

"Something's gone down at Eleventh," he said gravely. "Minaichi-taichou's been attacked."

"With respect, Minaichi-taichou, you seem remarkably unscathed if that's the case," Naoko turned her penetrating gaze on the older man, who glared back at her.

"If I wanted the opinions of a Third Seated officer on my combat prowess, I'd ask," he snapped. "There isn't time for me to waste repeating the same orders to each one of Ukitake's underlings individually, so pay attention. Sekime has been possessed, and attempted to kill me, but she's no match for me, and I have her unconscious within the Eleventh. My Division and Twelfth's officers are under the influence of some kind of drug, so I have nobody to call on for back-up. Instead of staring at me, maybe you could prove that Thirteenth is more than decorative and send me some officers to help contain the situation in case there's a second wave of attack?"

"Sekime-taichou?" Naoko's brows twitched together in concern. "It's Keitarou. I knew it. I knew that man would be trouble. I knew..." She trailed off, letting out a heavy sigh, and the Eleventh Captain had the impression she was gathering her composure. "I'm sorry, Minaichi-taichou. I didn't realise it was anything so serious. We suspected Aizen Keitarou had placed an attack on Seireitei, and now your words directly confirm he's controlling Captains. Taichou was awaiting further orders before we deployed, but things got more out of hand than we expected."

"Shikibu, I'm going to go with Atsushi-dono," Enishi cast the Third Seat a glance. "When the Captain comes back, tell him, and tell him I'll see him in Ugendou for a reprimand later if he sees fit. Ask too if he can spare more officers to Eleventh, since it seems as though we're the only force in this area capable of taking on trouble, just like he feared. For the time being, I'll take Tsukabishi with me. He's good with Kidou, and if Sekime-taichou's still feeling feisty when we get there, that'll be a help. You take charge here — and remember what Taichou said before he left."

"I'm not you. I don't have a sieve for a brain," was Naoko's acerbic reply. "You can rely on me. Go with Minaichi-taichou. I'll find Tsunemori and send him after you."

Enishi's expression became sheepish at her jibe, but he nodded, and, as she disappeared into shunpo to carry out the instruction, he turned to face the impatient Eleventh Captain.

"I'm at your disposal, Atsushi-dono," he said firmly. "Whatever I can do to help — lead the way."

At the same time Atsushi had been dealing with Mareiko's breakdown, across the military settlement the world had returned to the dust and stone of Seireitei's military barracks with a startling jolt, and Shunsui had had to put a hand out to steady himself, half afraid that he would fall headlong. What he had been doing for the previous few moments he could not say, but as his awareness returned to itself he realised that he was at the gates of the Third Division, his body having carried him there on momentum even whilst his mind had been roaming far and wide.

Kohaku.

He took a deep breath of air to suppress the rippling nausea in his gut, gazing around him for any sign of the young boy, but he could see no sign of him.

But a flare that intense... invading my thoughts like that... means he must be close. And that means...

He took another breath, steeling his nerves and pushing resolutely forward into the deserted Third Division grounds, taking in its untouched appearance as he went. Nobody was patrolling here, he realised with surprise. Kohaku had come here, he was certain of that, yet there was no sign of any struggle, nor any evidence of unconscious Twelfth Divisioners, knocked out by the force of Kohaku's hallucinogenic reiryoku. The significance of this was not lost on the Eighth Division Captain, and he frowned, unease setting in once more. Well, that was outside of the brief. Twelfth ought to have been here. Does that mean that Keitarou's spell spread wider than I thought... and something happened to Mareiko-chan and her people before they could get here? It's possible. We were occupied by Tenth's officers, and Seventh were busy at Ninth. There's been no opportunity to travel the other way... but if Twelfth have been affected, who knows what state Eleventh might be in. Or... or Thirteenth...

He shook his head, quickly dispelling this thought from his mind. No. I'm trusting the boy. I decided to trust him, and do things his way. If I falter now, I might not have time to do what needs to be done. If what Kohaku said is true, then I still have some time before I need to worry about Juu. I can't stand and worry about things I can't change, and so I'll focus on the things I can.

He slipped through the side entrance of the division, making his way through the halls and checking as he went for any signs of life, but as with the outside, there was none. Third had been left completely abandoned.

Shunsui's eyes narrowed, his mind flitting back to the images he had seen in Kohaku's hallucinatory vision. They had been vivid and disconcerting, but despite their revelations, he had felt no particular jolt of shock or horror at witnessing the scene. He alone among his companions had anticipated Kohaku's intentions, and though he had not imagined such a powerful, impactful vision, it had not stopped him in his tracks the way he suspected it had afflicted others. Whether this was because of what Kohaku had said about the nature of his reiryoku, he didn't know, but even whilst his mind had been distracted, his body had not stopped in its pursuit of Keitarou. For him, perhaps, the effect had been less all-encompassing than it ought to have been, an unreal kind of dream state through which he had still been, subconsciously, aware of his own self, and as a result he had felt only a dull sense of understanding, as, piece by piece, the gaps in his knowledge had slipped into place. He did not know how the vision would have affected his enemy, nor whether Kohaku's gamble had truly paid off— but if his particular resilience had bought him any extra seconds, it was now he had to use it. Kohaku had hoped to destroy the Senkaimon and free Keitarou's immediate victims, but he could not count on the young man's assistance any further. Kohaku had admitted that he wasn't sure whether his weakened body could endure such a flare of spirit power as would be needed, and Shunsui knew that there was a possibility he might find the stray's corpse at the scene of the crime. He had steeled himself for this possibility, telling himself that, unlike Juushirou, he had no personal bond with this youth — but as he ducked through Third's property, he felt a sense of unease about what he was about to see. Alive or dead, Shunsui knew the only way his strategy would work would be if Keitarou could not place his son's whereabouts, and so, if there was a body, there would be no time for squeamishness.

He pursed his lips, considering the hallucination once again. It had tallied with what Juushirou had said, about Minaichi's actions against his Vice Captain, but had gone so much further into the Eleventh Captain's past actions, exposing everything else that had followed Sakanoue's unexpected death. It was interesting information, tantalising to their other investigation, but Shunsui's emotions were tempered by what he now knew was at stake, and so he found he could view it clinically, almost detached from the scandal it would undoubtedly cause.

So, if Koku can be trusted, Kusakawa Shougo-dono was the one killing people in the Rukon. Another Urahara with a God complex. Minaichi killed his adjutant, just as Koku first described it to Juushirou, and more, he killed Kusakawa, but more by accident than by design. His role in all of this is suddenly, mind-blowingly clear, and now I know for certain that he's not the one we want. That was a Minaichi I had never seen before, but his reasons and his rationale I understand.

A rueful smile touched his lips, but his eyes remained sombre.

In one sense what I'm doing now is part-way the same as what he did then. True, I'm not in love with Juu, and it really looks as though Minaichi has a flame for Mareiko-chan. It's also not as though, ultimately, this will remain any kind of a secret. But I am acting on secret information, preparing to do what is necessary to bring an end to these hostilities. Juu will be angry when he finds out I've come here without him — and that I knew what was afoot and didn't tell him. Just like Minaichi was trying to make sure Mareiko-chan didn't get hurt, well, I'm trying to prevent Kohaku's other visions from becoming real. I don't intend to see Juu dead and broken on the ground if it can be at all prevented, even if it costs me my life to achieve it. I've been there, once, and I won't be there again. Well, who'd have thought that I would ever understand Minaichi's point of view on anything — but I do. I really feel that, at present, I do. He's not the spy we're looking for — which means we have to think again.

He pushed open the rear door of the Third Division barracks, following the neatly marked stone path towards the Senkaimon, where he and others had met to be transported to Rukongai what now seemed a lifetime ago. The gate then had been a glittering entity of life, the delicately constructed frame only just managing to hold together all the spiritual fibres needed to connect Seireitei with the worlds beyond, but as he approached it now, he could quickly see that his first suspicion had been correct. Instead of a fine, polished structure, the frame was shattered and in ruins, dark, acrid smoke still pouring out from all around it. The opening into the Dangai was probably still intact, Shunsui mused, as he approached the smouldering structure cautiously, but the means to activate it from this position was now gone, and, as a result, the corresponding gateway in the Real World location would, almost certainly, not allow the Captains in the Real World to make a quick and predictable return.

More reassuring, however, was the complete absence of Kohaku. There was no body, nor any discernable sign of blood. Either Keitarou had beaten him to it, securing his son's damaged body and escaping the scene, or Kohaku had survived his rush of power and had left on his own account. Shunsui knew he couldn't rule the first option out, but the more he looked at the scene, the more he felt the second scenario was the true one. There was no sign of Keitarou's presence here, and Kohaku had assured him that the intoxicifying flare of reiryoku would have affected the scientist's speed and movement. It was not much, he had said, but, probably, enough of a time lapse for Shunsui to reach the scene first, and the more he examined his surroundings, the more Shunsui found that they fitted with what the boy had said.

He let out a low whistle, circling the damaged control panel more closely and noting the wide, warped hole in the middle, the metal bent and twisted by an intense heat and the wooden surrounds little more than patchy pieces of charcoal and ash.

Well, Koku-kun. I suppose you were right, when you said you had to wait for your father to bring the sword before you could access all of your spirit power. The gate probably acted as a conductor or a transmitter, the vibrations of its death throes allowing you to transmit what you wanted people to see over an even further distance. I imagine this will take some explaining to Nagesu-sama, when he gets back — but since he doesn't look likely to return for some time, perhaps we'll have room to come up with something. Or maybe the Kyouraku will have to make a sponsored donation towards the rebuild... since it's probably Kyouraku reiryoku that's responsible for this vandalism.

A faint smile touched his lips, and he rested his hand against one of the less scorched areas, sensing for the first time the clear reiatsu signature against the surface. It was Kohaku's reiryoku, he noted, yet different from how it had ever felt before. Whereas the young boy's spirit power had been intoxicating, it had lacked any real thrust or power, but this was a different matter. He clicked his tongue against his teeth pensively.

Keitarou confined your reiryoku in a sword before you were ready or able to do it yourself... but now you've redressed that balance. I can feel it, Koku. It's here, the demon that haunts you, rearing its head and screaming its name loud enough that you finally heard it. Or maybe it wasn't the real demon. Maybe the real demon is the one stalking the both of us through Seireitei, looking to bring people to death.

Glancing at his hand, he hesitated, then made up his mind. Slowly his fingers began to glitter with bluish energy, and he pressed the tips more firmly against the remains of the gate controls, murmuring the words to Soukatsui and channelling his reiryoku through his body, sending it pulsing into the ruined device.

I think it's better right now that this looks like my handiwork. It seems more politic... and probably, less complicated in the long run if it turns out Nagesu-sama has issues with someone trashing his Division. More, though, I think it provides a more convincing scene... for when the visitor I'm expecting to arrive turns up. If Koku was right, he'll be here soon, and it will complicate my strategy if he knows the one who really blew up that thing was his son. I'm sorry, Koku, I'm adlibbing away from the script a little... but I have to do that, because I know your father in a completely different way from the way you do.

He flexed his fingers, firing one last Soukatsui into the mangled structure, then drew his hand back, testing once again for the potent waves of reiryoku he had felt on first arrival. They were still present, dispersed in the atmosphere all around him, but, to his satisfaction, it was no longer possible to discern Kohaku's reiatsu around the wrecked Senkaimon, and he eyed the incriminating charcoal dust that now covered his hand with approval.

“I should’ve known that I’d find you in this place.”

A voice, cold and accusing, suddenly penetrated his senses, and Shunsui did not turn around, unstartled by the other’s sudden presence.

“I’m surprised,” he said levelly, his calm tones belying his words. “This is Third Division, and my haori reads Eight. I thought you were capable of counting. Numeracy is a basic foundation of science, or so I’ve been told, Keitarou-san.”

“Where you are concerned, no boundaries or limits seem beyond your interference,” Shunsui could hear the sound of footsteps growing closer, and at the last minute he turned around, swinging Seibara’s sealed blade up to meet the speculative point of Chudokuga’s glittering edge. The scientist hopped back before Shunsui could follow up his defence with a swing of the other blade, clicking his tongue pensively against the roof of his mouth.

“Yes, I didn’t think I’d take you off guard so easily,” he admitted. “You knew I would come here, didn’t you? I wonder how.”

“I am not as stupid as you think I am,” Shunsui offered him a benign smile. ‘Even lazy mutts like me learn from past experience. Where you seem to be, most likely, you’re not. Therefore, where is the most illogical place to find you? An empty Division, far from where the fighting is? Of course. And which Division is the most attractive or useful to you? Obviously, the one which contains the most scientific bric-a-brac to play with. I might not understand what most of Nagesu-sama’s gadgets do, but I understand enough to know that, probably, they’d become an untapped arsenal if they fell into your hands. Though,’ he added, “I think you’ll find you’re misjudging the situation. You appear to have found me... not the other way around, so perhaps it was you who knew I would be here. I can’t imagine you’d want to risk me escaping, not when you’ve gone to such pains in the past to try to kill me.”

He turned, gazing at the smouldering Senkaimon with a pensive gaze.

“Still, your expression makes it clear that you didn’t come simply for the pleasure of renewing our acquaintance,” he added. “From the way you’re glaring at me, I assume it has something to do with that. I guess you had a use for it... it is based on your technology, so it’d be a very simple thing indeed for you to activate it, providing there were no shinigami guarding it. Well, there don’t seem to be any others, but there is me — so I’ll have to do. And desperate times call for desperate measures... which I'm not afraid to deploy."

Keitarou's gaze narrowed, his muddy brown eyes also darting to the remains of the Senkaimon.

"So, like a heathen you destroyed it, trapping your allies in the Real World and preventing you from calling for back-up, based on the very slim possibility I might come here?"

"Perhaps I did," Shunsui shrugged his shoulders, his nonchalant smile widening. "I can't build things, Keitarou. Kyouraku aren't very good at that. Destroying stuff, however — in that field, we have our uses. I think you'll agree that it's a pretty thorough job. Even you, with all your Senkaimon experience, probably couldn't open it easily, not now."

The smile froze on his lips, and he shot Keitarou a sidelong glance.

"And, even if it was a longshot, it worked. You did come here," he pointed out. "Plus, I had no intention of calling for back-up of any kind. I suspect you know that, and it explains your annoyance with me, but if you're hoping that Nagesu-sama and the others will come back on cue and you can use that demon sword to make them dance like you did Hakubei and Anabomi, you'll have to think of another strategy. They won't be coming back here — not yet, and not for a considerable amount of time, if my calculations are correct. In the meantime, you've stumbled into a physical problem of your own."

He drew Amaki's sword, crossing it casually across Seibara's, and Keitarou flinched, as if in anticipation of a sword release, but Shunsui grinned, lowering the weapon slightly at the man's caution.

"Yes, you realise it. You don't want me to release Katen Kyoukotsu, because you're not sure if you have a means to fight against it. I wonder how much you understand about my zanpakutou from our brief encounter so many years ago — some, perhaps, but I bet not enough to satisfy your scientist's brain. Not to mention the fact you know that, whether I liked it or not, I was raised in the heart of a military, bushi family who take sword-play and combat seriously and expect every son to be able to use a sword by the time they reach their majority. Your coming here has proven to be a more reckless gamble for you, I think, since you've run into someone you can't make a puppet of so easily, haven't you?"

"You think I can't take control of you, with my sword?" As Shunsui twitched his sword provocatively once more, Keitarou leapt back warily, his eyes angry and defensive. "Is that why you came here? You thought you could take me on and fight me to the death? I don't know what you think you know about my spirit power, but I am more powerful than I was when you put that dirty blade through my shoulder, and more, you have no element of surprise, not here. Your assumption that you're immune to me is a dangerous gamble, Kyouraku Shunsui. You've never taken my sword's power, so don't imagine that because you got the better of me once..."

"It's another gamble," Shunsui admitted blithely, swinging his swords casually away from one another. "I'm guessing, just as you said. But Katen Kyourakutsu and I, we rather thrive on playing games in which we can't be certain of the outcome. And, whenever you gamble, it's better to have a back-up strategy, just in case you need it."

"You're saying you have such a strategy?" Keitarou demanded suspiciously, and Shunsui nodded.

"Whether or not you can possess me with that thing remains to be seen. A hypothesis which I'm not really interested in seeing tested," he agreed lazily. "So I took some insurance, to make sure you don't feel tempted to try."

"And that is?" Keitarou arched an eyebrow, and Shunsui offered a sweet smile.

"How about the life of your son?" he suggested lightly, but there was ice in his eyes. "What about Kohaku's life?"

"Koku?" There was a momentary flicker in Keitarou's gaze, just the faintest glimmer of uncertainty, but Shunsui launched himself after it as he tried to ram his bluff home.

"Yes, Kohaku. Koku," he agreed lightly. "Either is fine, it doesn't matter which. Aren't you a bit concerned for his safety, whilst you stand there in front of me making idle threats?"

"You don't know anything about Kohaku!" Keitarou snapped, and Shunsui laughed, shrugging his shoulders.

"Perhaps you hadn't heard, but he's been lodging with a good friend of mine," he said dismissively. "You remember Juushirou, I'm sure you do. The idealistic one who believes in throwing his full heart and soul after everything he does."

He spun Seibara's wakizashi blade around, tossing it up in the air and catching it deftly between his fingers once more.

"Juushirou's idealistic, but you see, I'm not. I'm different," he added calmly. "He saw a boy in trouble. I saw a way to get to you. And so I waited here. I followed his reiryoku, and I waited for you to come after him. Kohaku is in my custody, Keitarou. If something happens to me, well, maybe my subordinate officers are under orders to kill him.”

“The Tenth and Ninth Division Captains danced to my tune, and your subordinate officers have been fighting their friends too hard to take any such order,” Keitarou looked derisive, and Shunsui shook his head, inwardly hoping and praying that his gamble was right.

“Eighth Division is bigger than you imagine, and my remaining forces are already divided,” he lied. “You’ve assumed I came here alone, but that doesn’t mean that I did. I’m not a school boy acting on my own whims, now, but a Captain with a large resource base of subordinates to whom those impulses can be delegated. Not all of my people are where you think they are, and not everything is happening according to your plan.”

Keitarou snorted.

“You’re bluffing,” he accused, and Shunsui shrugged, offering him another level smile.

“Then use your own senses to test me out. Do you sense fighting now?” he asked softly. “Do you, or do you sense peace? Can you sense your puppets moving at all, Keitarou, or have they vanished from your line of sight?”

Keitarou opened his mouth to retort, then hesitated, and Shunsui saw that flicker of dismay surface in the muddy gaze once more. He faltered, and Shunsui pushed forward once more.

“Your son is in my power,” he repeated frankly. “I can’t do anything about you or your sword, but I can take an injured, helpless boy prisoner and force him to do my bidding, in fear of his life or of yours. Kohaku is subject to a kill on sight order, and so are you. At any moment, his throat could be slit, but for my instructing him to be kept alive. Are you still sure you intend to use Chudokuga to meddle with me? My subordinates have been told that, if I should fall under your spell, Kohaku dies. And, if you leave this place without my permission... Kohaku dies.”

He reached over to tap Keitarou’s shoulder with the long end of Amaki’s sword, and Keitarou cursed, flinching back.

“You’re a smart man. I’m sure you’ve got the pattern without my explaining any further,” he said casually. “The Senkaimon was your draw here, but it’s gone, so we have some time to kill before Nagesu-sama and the others find a way to come back. I realise that he’s smart enough to find an alternative path, so I don't want to waste my time talking to you. If you want to save your son, you're going to have to dispatch me, so I can't send a message back to my subordinates to have the boy killed. And, to kill the people holding him, you have to go through me, now."

"I knew there was a good reason why I despised you," Keitarou's face twisted into a mask of hatred and frustration. "You think too much like me, and you aren't fooled by smokescreens as much as your fellows. You were dangerous when first we met, and most people I try to kill don't survive as many attempts as you. You were always a problem for me... and here you are again, rearing your ugly head and preaching your twisted values. How far the shinigami of Seireitei have sunk if they have to use a hostage to try and control my actions! Do you really think that your officers can contain Kohaku in his current state? He has his sword."

"And he is in my control," Shunsui repeated calmly. "You're a man of logic, and of probabilities. You can judge for yourself if my words are true or a lie. But, if they're a lie, explain this to me. How was it that, just now, this entire area was filled with a hallucination only your son could have projected? Your son, who is the only one other than you who is capable of breaking through your control over other people... if he's not under my power, Keitarou, why would he do that? Why would he free the shinigami, if I didn't have a knife to his throat?"

The horror and dismay that flooded Keitarou's expression this time was unguarded and real, and even Shunsui was taken aback by the depth of fear in the other man's pale brown eyes. For a moment, he wondered whether Keitarou had known or suspected Kohaku's actions from the start, and then he shook his head, letting out a heavy sigh.

"You are really too clever for your own good, or mine," he murmured, and Shunsui was surprised to hear the grudging respect in the other man's words. "If we were not so ideologically opposite, I might even praise you for such a twist. I had never proven for certain that Kohaku was able to break my power's hold, but I had theorised that he might... one day... have that ability. For you to have learned it, and manipulated it to free your friends... the only way you could've discovered such a thing is by having Kohaku in your power. I sensed your reiatsu on the move, and I know that Koku came in this direction. My son's aura is all around here, telling me that you took him and probably by force. What you told him, I don't know. He's young, and impressionable, and sometimes, highly foolish. But I cede that, probably, the evidence suggests that your account is true. He might obey you, knowing that my plan is not yet finished and that breaking my sword's hold wouldn't prevent me from using Chudokuga on other people... that judgement is also something I can recognise as my son's mind. He would rather cede to you than attack you if there was another option... and if you came here and took him off guard, likely he didn't know what else to do."

"You sound remarkably unconcerned about it," Shunsui remarked, and Keitarou shrugged.

"You just told me that you have him, as opposed to killing him outright, despite your Council's order," he pointed out astutely. "That would make me gamble... that you don't intend to kill him at all. So long as I am here, Kohaku is safe. He might be a lever to get me to do your bidding, but staying here and killing you is convenient and it won't prevent me from continuing with my original plan. As you said, there's some time to kill before Nagesu-nii and the others return, and I need them to progress with my business here. You won't kill my son, and so I have nothing to fear."

"Why would you think that?" Shunsui arched an eyebrow. "I thought I'd already established that I am not the same as Juushirou. Had you forgotten that my sword pierced his heart, once, to rid him of your control? A man capable of killing his best friend is surely capable of ordering the death of his enemy's son without a moment's hesitation? He is useful to me. Bait to lure you here and keep you under my control... it means nothing to me whether he lives or he dies."

"Perhaps that is true," Keitarou's eyes narrowed, and Shunsui could see that he was calculating his position, trying to work out how much he could push and how much time he could buy whilst he thought his way around the damaged Senkaimon, "but I also know your weakness. Juushirou is your friend. You reminded me of that fact yourself, that day we met in the forests of the Real World. You stabbed him to free him from Chudokuga, but you made it clear to me that you would protect him. And you might not have been fooled by Kohaku, but Juushirou was. Hurting that boy will hurt your closest friend, and you know it."

"Juushirou is my friend, but other friends are fighting and dying," Shunsui said evenly. "I'm not as honourable as you're trying to suggest, not if I see a way to get out of a messy situation. This is your war, you began it, and everyone here sees you as the villain. Me, I'm different. I understand that, the moment we began fighting you, we were no better than you. You need to be stopped, and I've decided to stop you. I don't care what lengths I have to go to to achieve it — even if that means Juushirou hates me. Because, if he's alive hating me, Keitarou, that's preferable to his being dead. And if your plan continues, there's a very good chance that more people will die."

"Like the Ninth Captain?" Keitarou's words held a challenge, but Shunsui maintained his gaze, unphased.

"Yes, like Anabomi," he said softly. "So, enough talking about it. If you're as strong as you say you are now, maybe you'll be able to kill me and free your son from my custody. Maybe you'll be able to win this game of life and death. I'm willing to gamble my life on it — are you?"

He swung his swords around, pressing the blades against each other in a cross formation, and this time both weapons began to glimmer with light, recognising their master's call to arms.

"We do have some time to kill," he added, "so I suggest we settle the differences between us once and for all."

Author's Note

I realised today that I've been writing about Juu and Shun for about four and a half years now, since Meifu's prequel was posted in December 08. That's staggering and very scary. I had no idea I had that many words in me or that much fan babble to share. I am blaming the reviewers for encouraging me. It wouldn't have happened without all of you — have cookies on me. Only hope that Orihime didn't make them...

I shall feel very lost when this story is over as to what I should be writing about o.o.

68. Ninth

Chapter Sixty Six: Ninth

Suddenly, everything had stopped moving.

Sora opened her eyes, staring up blankly at the haze of blue and white that now filled the whole of her vision. For a moment she lay still, unable to make sense of what she was seeing or where she was, but, little by little awareness began to return to her, and she realised with a jolt that she was lying on her back on cobbled stone, her sword nowhere near her right hand. Scrabbling at the stones in vain for Hotarue's hilt, Sora hurriedly pulled herself into a sitting position. The next instant she regretted it, for her vision swam and blurred, a dull ache setting up in the base of her skull. Still, the world around her appeared surreal. Hadn't it been raining? Hadn't she been holding her sword, fighting against a man... a man in a haori...

She groaned, burying her head in her hands as she struggled to make sense of her memories. Shards of her fight against her brother were sliced and shuffled in between images of two men in the Rukon, haori damp from rain and blood, and swords glittering in the hazy light. Were they one battle or two? She couldn't recall, nor could she clearly separate herself from the men she had seen fighting so vividly moments before. She had been on grass then, she remembered dully, lowering her fingers instinctively to the hard stone that lay beneath her. Was this reality or was this the dream? Her sluggish brain could not tell her.

Gradually, Sora's vision began to return into focus, bringing her surroundings into sharper view, and she raised her head, gazing around her gingerly so as not to excite her aching head once more. This was Eighth Division, she realised absently. She was not in the Rukon any more — or had she ever been? She struggled again to remember, but it was to no avail — the images were too jumbled for her to put into coherent order.

A dull moan from across the cobbles made her turn cautiously, registering for the first time that she wasn't alone. Her fingers finally brushed against Hotarue's hilt, curling around it as she instinctively anticipated an attack, but it did not come. Instead, she saw her brother, head clutched in his hands and zanpakutou lying discarded and sealed on the ground before him. He was ash pale and shaking, and, gazing at him, Sora could not believe her memories of fighting him were any more real than the ones she had seen in the Rukon rain. Not far from Hakubei's shuddering form lay his Vice Captain, tightly bound with a vibrant Hainawa spell and apparently unconscious. Although she could sense her own reiatsu emitting from the glowing ropes, Sora could not remember firing the Bakudou. On the other side of the yard, Shindou was sprawled in ungainly fashion face down on the ground, and though she knew she ought to be hurrying to check whether he was hurt, Sora's dazed brain could only observe that, in this light, he looked rather like a black splat against the grey stone.

She drew a slow breath into her lungs, gauging the scene once more and assessing everything in careful detail. It took her a few more moments to register the fact that someone was missing, but her world snapped into full clarity as she remembered the expression on her Captain's face in the moments before he had disappeared from Eighth.

Not long afterwards, a surging, paralysing vision had swept through the Eighth Division grounds, and then...

Sora sheathed the sealed Hotarue, shoving the protesting weapon into its scabbard with little care and pulling her aching body to her feet. She ran clumsy fingers through her dusty hair, pulling it back from her face and re-tying the length of white ribbon to keep the messy curls once more out of her face. Now she knew what she had been doing, and what had been at stake. Had Shunsui had something to do with the hallucination? It was hard to tell, but Sora's gut told her that it was highly possible. Whatever he had been planning, whatever he had come back from Thirteenth in such a temper and why he had looked so serious and clinical that morning had something to do with whatever he had left the Eighth to do — and, possibly, was still doing.

His choice was probably reckless and stupid, but though she glanced in the direction of the gate, Sora did not attempt to follow her superior officer. Shunsui was the Captain, and, foolish and lackadaisical as he often liked to behave, she knew that, deep down, he understood the gravity of situations better than anyone in Seireitei. She trusted him, and so she would not follow him. He had trusted her, too — leaving her behind to ensure that nobody at Eighth lost their lives. Sora's wits were returning to her with speed now, and she turned to glance at her brother, fingers curled around Hotarue's hilt in preparation of a renewed assault. Whatever Shunsui was up to, he could only do it if she was doing her job and backing him up — even if that meant fighting her brother and taking him forcibly into Eighth's custody.

But fighting seemed to be the last thing on Hakubei's mind. As she approached her brother warily, Sora realised that, far from grabbing his sword and swinging back into the action to take her off guard, Hakubei looked far more like he wanted to be sick. He was still visibly shaking, whether from shock, exertion or some other factor she could not tell, and she paused about a foot away from his body, lifting the sheathed Hotarue from her waist and using the rounded, ebony-wood tip to prod him gently on the shoulder.

It was a light poke, but Hakubei reacted as if stung, falling back on his heels with an ungainly thud. It was an unenviable position for a Captain and an elder brother to find himself in, Sora reflected. In other circumstances it would have prompted a round of lively, mutual banter, but this time she found nothing humorous in the situation, and as he raised stricken eyes to hers, Sora knew her brother felt the same. As their gazes met, however, Sora felt relief flood through every valve and vessel of her heart, for the eyes were Hakubei's eyes, not the stone gaze of the advancing enemy, and she knew that Keitarou's spell had somehow been broken.

A moment of silence passed between them, then Hakubei moistened his lips.

"Sora?" he murmured uncertainly, followed by, "Are you all right?"

"I think I ought to be asking you that question, don't you?" Sora's words were light, but she kept her distance nonetheless, believing her companion returned to her, yet not quite wanting to trust her impressions in case it was a trap. "You look ready to hurl all over me."

"Don't joke about it," Hakubei's brow creased in anger, but it was frustrated, disorientated anger, not the killing intent he had had moments before, and Sora sighed, pushing Hotarue once more through her belt as she realised the fight was well and truly over. She squatted down before her companion, resting her hand reassuringly on his shoulder as though she were the one wearing the haori and taking command.

"I'm not joking," she said gravely. "It's how you look, and almost certainly, how you feel. You must be still hallucinating, if you think you could do anything to physically harm me with that toy sword of yours. You've gotten soft — you're only lucky that the fight got broken up when it did, else you might've found yourself trussed up like Kanshi, Haku-nii."

Hakubei's gaze slid across to where his Vice Captain was slowly beginning to come out of his own stupor, letting out exclamations as he registered his bound state, and a weak smile touched his lips. It did not reach his eyes, though, and Sora was startled by the depth of fear and confusion that she saw there. Hakubei had always been the joker of the family, laid back, easy company and as children, her frequent partner in crime. She had never seen him so discomposed, and though she tried to tell herself it was her imagination, she knew deep down that it was not. She frowned, pursing her lips.

“What happened, Haku-nii?” she asked softly, and Hakubei’s gaze returned to hers, a helplessness in his expression.

“I wish I knew how to answer, or even if there was one to give,” he admitted. “My head is hazy. Bits are really clear, and other bits, not there at all. I remember talking to Anabomi by the Division gate. We were discussing patrols, I think, or something equally mundane. He’s been unusually conversational lately, and so I lingered for a while to compare notes on how Ninth were handling Sixth’s obligations and Tenth, Fifth’s. We were in the same boat, so it seemed sensible to me that we at least communicate about it, and for once, Anabomi agreed.”

Anabomi? “Sora’s lips thinned, then,” Anyone else with you, do you remember?”

“Kanshi was there, but I don’t remember anyone else. Anabomi was alone,” Hakubei’s brow creased, as though the effort of trying to remember caused him pain. “I remember joking about him having Mikihara’s nose firmly to the grindstone, so he definitely wasn’t with us. After that, it goes blurry. I remember I was going back inside Tenth. Then it goes black. Next clear thought I have, I’m at Eighth, and suddenly I can’t move, can’t talk, can’t do anything at all. I’m inside my body, Sora, but it’s not mine any more. Someone else is running the controls. I can see, I can hear everything you, and Shunsui, and Shindou are saying, and I know everything I’m doing, but I can’t stop it. Every swing I feel, but it’s not me swinging. Every spell I fire, but it’s like someone else fired it. Trying to attack you. Trying to... kill you. You, and Shunsui, and Shindou. I came here to kill you... but I don’t know how, or why, or why, thank God, it’s finally stopped.”

He rubbed his eyes with his hands, then,

“I saw Minaichi, and Kusakawa,” he added. “They were arguing, fighting... Kusakawa was killed. I don’t have clear memories of what they said, just that Kusakawa was lying in a pool of blood and that, somehow, it was justice. Then I was here, and I could move again... and if it wasn’t that I’m scrambling to keep hold of the last scraps of my sanity and my Captain's dignity, I'd probably break down and bawl like a baby with relief. I'm sorry, Sora. I can't explain it and I wish I could — but I am sorry."

"Idiot," Despite herself Sora offered him a grin, reaching up to cuff him lightly across his aching head. He winced, pushing her hand away, but Sora took no notice. "Shunsui said that Keitarou had you under his control. He was using you as a puppet — and probably not just you. You said you were with Anabomi and with Kanshi, right? Well, we didn't wrap Kanshi up in Kidou for the good of his health, I assure you, and as for Anabomi..."

She turned to glance at the cracked, chipped marble divide, then let out a gusty sigh.

"Something happened there," she said with a shrug. "Don't know what, but it did."

"Sora, are you planning to untie me, or are you just going to sit and sigh and gaze around your Division while I lie here like norimaki on the ground?" Kanshi's vocal complaint seemed to rouse Hakubei from his shock, and he turned, gazing at his Vice Captain with something more like his usual expression.

"If you're going to get yourself knotted up in my sister's Kidou, you deserve to wriggle," he said frankly, grabbing the hilt of his sword and getting to his feet. "I guess a Captain's duty is to look after their Vice Captain, though. How's your head, Kanshi? If it's anything like mine, it's starting up a thunderstorm."

"Complete with full blown blasts of lightning," Kanshi said ruefully, as Hakubei ran the edge of his sword blade through the spiritual rope, allowing his adjutant to work himself free of the spell. "Yeesh, what was that? What the hell were we doing, Taichou? My mind's a complete blur — I just remember that, for some inexplicable reason, I'd climbed the Ninth wall and was trying to cut off Shindou's head."

"Aizen Keitarou," Sora said succinctly, stepping over the bits of debris from the Division sign and approaching the prone body of her Third Seat, who was finally beginning to stir. "I think Shunsui anticipated it — he didn't seem as surprised as we did, when you showed up like this. He wasn't happy about it, but he wasn't surprised. He left a little while ago... then that hallucination knocked me for six, so I couldn't tell you how long ago it was. I don't even know what it was. I'm just trusting that my mad Captain knows what he's doing, and that this is all part of his plan."

"Whatever that thing was, I think it broke whatever was going on inside of me,” Hakubei reflected, reaching down to haul Kanshi to his feet. “I couldn’t stop it on my own, but all of those images overloaded my senses completely. I felt something slipping out of me as I came to myself — Kanshi, what about you?”

“I don’t really know,” Kanshi said honestly, scratching his head. “I felt as though I was being shown some kind of bizarre play, only it was clearly not my imagination, if you saw it too. It was Minaichi... and someone else, wearing the Twelfth haori. It definitely wasn’t Sekime-taichou. It was a man, with fair hair. They were fighting. They released their swords... and Minaichi said something about justice and bringing the other to book. There was another man, too — a man who became a Hollow.”

“Sakanoue Heiji,” Hakubei looked grave, and Sora started, staring at her brother in alarm.

“Eleventh’s former Vice Captain?” she demanded, and Hakubei nodded.

“No mistake about it,” he confirmed. “I didn’t hear the words they spoke, Sora, but I remember faces. What we saw made it look as though Sakanoue wasn’t killed by Hollows in Rukongai. Instead he became a Hollow and Minaichi had to finish him, because once you cross the line, there’s no way back. Unless I’m misreading my body language, it looked very much as though Minaichi wasn’t amused. Most specifically, he wasn’t amused with Kusakawa.”

“Kusakawa?” Kanshi frowned, and Hakubei let out a gusty sigh.

“Before your time. Both of you, I guess,” he reflected, “but the first Captain of the Twelfth Division was Kusakawa Shougo. You must’ve heard the name, especially lately. It’s funny, you know. Anabomi and I spoke about the man just a short few days ago. He and Anabomi were friends, and Anabomi spoke about him and how he died in the Rukon. Now something like this happened.”

“But was any of what we saw real?” Shindou dragged his body into a sitting position, casting his companions a slightly dazed smile. “I guess the fighting’s over. Did I miss anything interesting?”

“No, not really,” Sora shook her head. “As for whether or not what we saw is real, I think the first thing we have to do is work out what we saw. No, before that, even. We need to know what caused it... and whether or not that thing is friend or foe. The fact it seems to have released Haku-nii and Kanshi from the spell makes me think it’s not hostile — but if the one pulling the puppet strings was Aizen Keitarou, like Shunsui said, he’s a trickster and it could be a trap. There might be a hoarde of his zombies preparing to march on the Eighth as we speak.”

“I don’t think so,” Kanshi frowned, taking a few steps towards the wrecked gate and gazing pensively outside. “On the contrary, Sora... it’s really really quiet.”

“The calm before the storm?” Hakubei’s expression became troubled. “Or, maybe, in between the storms.”

He raised his gaze to the wrecked remains of the Eighth’s gate, then let out another gusty sigh.

“I guess I’ll be paying for that,” he observed, resignation in his tones. “Tell Shunsui, Sora, that I’ll settle with him over the gate when this is done.”

“Providing it gets done and we all survive to build a new gate,” Sora said grimly. “Wherever Shunsui’s gone, I am certain he didn’t want us to follow him. Still, Eighth is no longer under immediate attack. Kaoru has charge of the lower officers who are still here. Most of Eighth are on patrol already — including Shizuka, thank goodness, because Shunsui’d have kittens if she was here through all of this — and the orders are that everyone is to remain undercover until they’re given orders to the contrary. Kaoru is reliable. She won’t go anywhere or do anything without Tetsu or I telling her so.”

“I wonder what state Tenth are in,” Kanshi looked anxious. “Taichou, do you remember...”

“Not a thing,” Hakubei admitted. “And I’m concerned about what else has happened since we’ve been incapacitated. Kanshi, are you fit to shunpo?”

“Probably. My brain is rattling around my head some, but that’s nothing new for me and it hasn’t fallen out of my ears yet, so I’m probably safe to at least try,” Kanshi’s reply was far more nonchalant than any of them felt. “Why, do you want me to go back to Tenth? I can, if you like. I think I’m in one piece, and now I think about it, it won’t take long. There aren’t any officers at the barracks, if you remember. Tenth are on patrol in their entirety, thanks to Kyouki-sama’s requests — and some of Eighth are with them.”

“So they are,” Hakubei looked relieved. “In that case, then, save your strength. I don’t care if the infrastructure is trashed — it’s only buildings and they can be replaced more easily than lives and limbs. If this is a war situation — which it apparently is — we ought to be making ourselves useful. Sora, what did you mean when you said something had happened at Ninth?”

“I think the most accurate term for it would be a massacre, Hakubei-dono.”

Before Sora could respond, Hajime materialised on the cobbles before them, making all four officers jump, and Sora and Hakubei reach instinctively for their swords. He held up his hands to indicate he was not holding his weapon and had not come to attack, and Sora sighed, releasing her grip.

“Kitabata,” she murmured. “You’ve come from Hirata — you want Shunsui, correct?”

“I did, but he’s not here,” Hajime glanced around him. “Taichou asked for anyone from Eighth who could be spared. There’s been an incident at Ninth. We need further officers to manage it appropriately. The immediate danger has been managed, but we believe the main enemy is still on the loose.”

“You said a massacre,” Kanshi murmured. “What do you mean, Kitabata?”

Hajime arched an eyebrow.

“With respect, Kanshi-dono, an Endou doesn’t use that word lightly,” he said archly, and Kanshi offered a sheepish expression in response. “A distress call came to us from a member of the Ninth. She didn’t come here, because it was believed you were fighting — but as things have calmed here, Taichou would appreciate the support of senior officers from Eighth — and Tenth, if it can be spared.”

“I think what Kanshi meant, Kitabata, is what extent the damage is at Ninth Division.” Hakubei spoke soberly. “I was with Anabomi, and so was Kanshi, before all this began. I’m concerned for him, and for his Division.”

“Your concern for Anabomi-taichou is too late,” As Hakubei’s eyes widened in stricken dismay at the implications in the man’s words, Kitabata turned on his heel, as though preparing to leave. Sora darted forward, putting a hand on his arm to prevent him.

“More details,” she said quietly. “As a Vice Captain and officer in current charge here at Eighth, I want to know more details. We’ll come, but only when we know what we’re facing. We won’t be of use to you otherwise.”

“It’s not something that really should be reported in detail in an open space where anyone might be listening,” Kitabata shrugged himself neatly away from Sora's touch, but met her gaze with a grave one of his own. "I'm sorry, Sora-dono. I don't mean disrespect, but I carry my Captain's urgency in my words and his commands supersede yours. I was told simply to tell you that there'd been an incident at Ninth, and that it was of the severest degree. For the rest, if you come, you'll soon see that Ninth are, at present, in very grave danger of having no living officers above Sixth Seat remaining to them before this day is out."

"What?" Kanshi blanched, and Hakubei nodded grimly, his expression dark and clouded.

"It's all right, Kitabata," he said firmly. "I'll be coming with you, to answer Hirata-dono's request. Kanshi, you too. Sora?"

"I'll come," Sora's own expression was one of shock. "Tetsu, can I leave you to explain to Kaoru what's happened, and take charge of things here in my absence?"

"Understood," Shindou's cheeky features had become solemn, and he nodded. "I'll hold the fort till the Captain comes back, Sora-dono. You can count on me."

The world was still burning.

For a moment, nothing moved, then, as bolts of stabbing heat burned through every inch of his body, Kohaku felt his consciousness stir, rudely awoken from the silent darkness into a world of colour and pain.

He was alive.

He gasped air into his lungs, suddenly desperate for oxygen. With every spasm of his chest muscles, he felt his awareness of his surroundings grow clearer and more tangible, till he could feel the soft grass beneath his body. Clumsily he moved his left arm, running the delicate blades between his fingers as he struggled to pull himself into a more upright position. It took him several tries, as for some reason, he could not feel or remember that his right arm existed, but at length he managed it. Dragging in more gulps of spirit-enriched air, he fought to bring his surroundings into focus. Where was he? Where was this place, and how had he got here?

He gazed around blankly, searching for a landmark he knew, but there was nothing. Hazily he remembered the sensation of the gate's frame bending and warping around him, and the fragmented memories that had swirled around his head, lost and detached from their usual moorings. The fight in the Rukon surfaced briefly, causing a brief moan to pass his lips, for although he did not understand why, the image of shinigami in battle made his chest ache and tighten once again.

He closed his eyes, trying to compose himself.

He had been at the Third Division. He had gone to destroy the Senkaimon, and to send out a signal across as much of Seireitei as he could manage. He had played his last card, gambled everything he knew on that one attempt. He had prevented the Captains of the Second, Third, Fifth and Sixth from returning to Seireitei and falling into Keitarou's trap, and he had released the manipulated Captains from the spell his father had put them under — but he knew that the battle was far from won. The scent of death and destruction on the air filled his nostrils, a cloying, acrid sensation, and he opened his eyes, but whatever had passed through his other senses was invisible to his eyes. Maybe it wasn't there at all, he mused absently. Maybe it was just the scent of death on the wind, causing him to plunge back into a delusionary state.

A prickle from his right side drew his attention, and he glanced down, seeing for the first time the limp, motionless shape of his right arm, hanging down against the side of his body. Tentatively he prodded it with the index finger of his left hand, noticing the scalding burns that covered his palm as he did so. The arm felt heavy and clumsy, as though something had seared through his nerves and rendered it numb, but as he brushed his other hand against it, the prickles intensified, and little by little he found he could move it. He twitched the fingers of his right hand, wincing as pain shot through the limb. He could see signs of blood and burning around the skin of his fingers, as though they had taken a huge burst of energy. Something was clutched in this wounded, bloody right hand, and Kohaku's brow furrowed in consternation as his gaze ran over the unmistakeable shape of a sword. Dimly he remembered receiving a blade from his father, what seemed like an eternity before, but it was not the same weapon that he now saw before him. Gone was the Sekkiseki hilt, and instead of a misshapen, ugly blade, he saw a gleaming silver curve of steel, glimmering and sparkling in the Seireitei sunlight. It was as though it was shimmering with pride, Kohaku thought absently, like a butterfly who had broken free from its cocoon and displayed its beauty to the world for the first time. Gingerly he shifted apart the painful fingers of his right hand, scanning the hilt for the carved characters that made up his name, but instead the polished ebony hilt was engraved with the unmistakeable pattern of flowers that he had seen decorating the mirror deep within Kyouka's dream castle. His eyes widened at this realisation, and he gazed at the blade as if seeing it for the first time. Was it really just sunlight making it shine? For a moment he thought he saw his own reflection, the chains shattering into fragments of silver shrapnel, but the impression was gone as soon as it had come, and he was not sure whether, in his shell-shocked state, he had imagined it.

He moved his left hand to touch the blade's surface, feeling the soft hum of energy and life lurking deep within the metal surface.

"Kyouka," his lips parted, two hoarse words dropping from his lips. "Kyouka... Raigen."

The sword glittered again, and this time Kohaku felt sure that it had done so on purpose, acknowledging its name.

He glanced around himself once more, trying to get his bearings, but it was no good. Somehow he had left the Third Division, though he had no memory of walking here. Had he walked, or had he come some other way? He could not put the pieces together enough to tell, but from the way his heart was still racing, he felt certain it had had something to do with his surging spirit power. Had he somehow used shunpo? He had never learned the technique, but in the moment the gate had exploded, he had felt invincible, as though anything and everything was in his power.

And then he had been here, shattered and dazed on foreign ground.

A surge of spiritual energy from behind him made him tense, recognising the raw edge of Katen Kyoukotsu, rising up in confrontation. The next moment, he had sensed a more familiar surge of bitter energy, as his father unleashed Chudokuga's spirit into the ether. A chill ran down his spine as he realised how much time he must have lost whilst unconscious.

He struggled to pull himself to his feet, the sword feeling heavy and unwieldy in his weak arm, but although it was hard to regain his balance whilst he was holding it, he could not let it go. Whatever it was, and whatever it had become, it felt as though it was a part of him, and if he left it behind, he would have abandoned himself. The sword hummed and buzzed in his grip, sending pain signals through his burnt hand, but still he did not try to let go. Instead he gritted his teeth, focusing on one step in front of the other.

He had not expected to survive the flare of power at Third, and so he had engaged Shunsui's help, knowing the older man was capable of completing things which he himself could not do. The other shinigami had been delayed, but they would return, and time was running out.

Kohaku's gaze flitted back in the direction of the swirling spirit blades, his heart clenching in his throat. He did not need to see the battle to know what would occur, for he had seen it, many times, in his dreams and nightmares over the year. Still, even though he knew this, his soul was uneasy.

The shinigami will come back. There's another gate. I didn't realise, but there's... another gate. A gate... at Twelfth. I must...

He staggered forward, taking one step and almost tripping over his own feet.

I must get... to Ukitake-dono. I can't do anything... now. But if I told him... maybe...

He took another shaky step, then another, focusing his mind on the Thirteenth Division's Captain, but as he did so, another image flashed across his senses, that of a man in a white haori, broken and crumpled on the stone forecourt of his Division, surrounded by the bloody remains of his men. Despite himself, he let out a whimper of dismay, losing his footing and tumbling onto the hard cobbles of the thoroughfare. The images flooded through him once more, Juushirou's corpse replaced by another, more vivid one, and he screwed up his eyes in distress, unable to shut the pictures out.

There's no going back, Kohaku.

The voice was Kyouka's, but Kohaku had never heard it resonate so gently against his thoughts before.

This is the path you've chosen to take. Things that have begun cannot be reversed. You can see the future, but you can't turn back the past.

The sword still grasped tightly in his hand, Kohaku struggled to pull himself back up, but it was to no avail. A fresh bevy of images washed over him, making him dizzy and nauseous, and in the back of his mind, he heard a sigh.

The one you want to protect is safe. Rest now. You can change nothing else in this future, and I will not let you kill yourself by trying. Whoever else dies today, it will not be you, so surrender. Your work is done.

That was the last thing Kohaku heard, as darkness crashed in from all four corners of his consciousness, and he crumpled, falling forward onto the dusty ground.

"Oh God."

Sora stood in the entrance of the Ninth Division, her clever features pale as she took in the scale of the devastation.

The yard was damaged, with all but the marble wall succumbing to the fury of the Wind Hawk and Anabomi's lurching, demented attacks, and the entire front of the building had been blown to smithereens, exposing the normally neat corridors and chambers of Ninth as a cluttered mass of debris, splinters and dust. It was not the physical destruction of the site that had made her stomach lurch, however, but the other cost her neighbouring division had paid. Like Hakubei, Sora cared little for physical infrastructure, preferring to prioritise people's lives over their possessions, and as a consequence, it was the solemn procession of corpses that, one by one were being brought and laid out on the cobbles that had stifled her, leaving her lost for words.

Four corpses lay on the stone, carefully laid out by Hirata's subordinate officers. Though the three lesser officers' corpses had been wrapped with thick, expensive cloth that looked like it had been looted from Anabomi's private chamber, there was no hiding the carnage beneath, for the fabric was already staining from the blood seeping through the wounds. It had not escaped Sora's notice that one of the officers' heads was placed above his neck, but was not attached, and despite her stoic nature, Sora felt physically sick.

And then, she saw Anabomi, with his dislocated shoulders and a mangled left arm which slowly oozed a dark, bloody slime onto the stone. The slightly numb sensation of disbelief was ripped away, leaving a deep, throbbing sense of guilt.

We could've stopped this. If we'd left Eighth sooner... beaten Haku-nii and Kanshi quicker... our neighbours needed our help, and we were never in this kind of danger. Whatever happened here... we weren't available to help them. Hirata arrived too late... and now...

"Sora," Hakubei gave her a little nudge, and she raised her gaze to her brother, seeing the identical pain mirrored in his green eyes. He nodded, and she sighed, reaching up to rub her brow.

"We should've prevented this," she murmured. "I wonder if that's why Shunsui left... though I'm sure he must've realised what had happened here before I did."

"Well, he's not here, and it doesn't look like he's paid a visit, so wherever he is, we'll have to do without him," Hakubei spoke briskly, but Sora knew that he was as shaken as she was. "I'm not your Captain, and I know you resent it when I or Ryuusei-nii give you orders, but in this instance, it might be well to stick with Kanshi and I. Hirata-dono sent for us but he didn't want us to fight. That's over, for now... and our job is to figure out what happened, how, and why."

“Sora... Hakubei-dono,” Hirata himself crossed the cobbles at that moment, his own uniform dusty and his dark hair loosed from the tail that he normally wore behind his head. His expression was unreadable behind his glasses, and Sora was aware of threads of stray spirit power, understanding that the Wind Hawk had been coralled, but it had not yet settled from the thrill of battle.

“Hirata, about Anabomi...” she began, and Hirata turned, his gaze going to the corpse of the Captain. He nodded.

“I killed him,” he said frankly. “It wasn’t what I came here intending, but the situation forced my hand.”

“There’s a lot of chalk dust around his body,” Kanshi knelt a respectful distance from the Captain’s cooling corpse, brushing his fingers against the delicate white powder and running it between his fingers. “Hirata... I mean, Endou-taichou, is this..?”

“The remains of a Hollow mask,” Hirata confirmed, suddenly looking weary, and Sora bit her lip, understanding what it was about the atmosphere that had made her feel so uneasy. It was the residual presence of a damaged soul, rattling her nerves and skewing with her judgement.

“Anabomi was a Hollow?” Hakubei’s eyes narrowed to slits. “Hirata-dono, I think you need to explain that more clearly. We were under the impression Anabomi was controlled by Keitarou. Kanshi and I were also under his control — but as you can see, neither of us are spiritually damaged. Shaken up and humiliated, but alive and definitely not Hollow.”

“You were under Keitarou’s control too?” For a moment, Sora thought Hirata might draw his weapon from it’s sheath again, and she hurried to stand between her old friend and her brother, holding up her hands.

“Kanshi and Haku-nii are fine, Hirata. Whatever was inside of them, that mad hallucination broke it. We don’t know what it was, or where it came from — but whatever it was, it broke Keitarou’s hold over them and they came back to themselves. We fought at Eighth, but the battle is over there now as a result.”

“The hallucination?” It was impossible for Hirata’s expression to grow any more grim, then he turned back towards where his subordinates had just finished laying out the corpses. “Joumei?”

“Yes, sir?” A silver-haired, skinny youth of about the same age as Hirata’s lost son raised his head, rubbing the drying blood dust against his shihakushou. Hirata twitched his fingers to indicate the young man should join them, and he did so, surprise and concern crossing his features. He picked his way across the cobbles, carefully avoiding the scattered debris, and Sora let out a gasp, registering the fact that, though the black uniform did not show it clearly, the man's obi was stained with patches of deep, brownish red.

"We were all here when the hallucination swept through here," Hirata spoke slowly. "I don't know what it was, and it took a couple of my officers off their feet. Fortunately, Kikyue and Hajime recovered quickly, and I kept my footing... but it took us all by surprise."

His eyes shifted to the silver-haired newcomer, and Sora saw her old friend's eyes cloud slightly.

"All of us except you, Joumei, who seemed barely affected by it," he corrected, "...and now Sora's telling me that Keitarou's control over Hakubei-dono and Souryou-kun was broken by this shattering of senses. You're the only one who might be able to explain that to me... so if you can... I suggest you do."

Joumei's gaze flitted to first Hakubei, then Kanshi, and Sora could sense the unease in his slender frame. At length he bowed his head.

"Keitarou tried to use me as a puppet, too, but the spell was broken," he explained pensively. "When that happened, Hirata-dono, my entire world was a flood of alien images, most of which were unpleasant memories I would sooner forget. The spirit power that shattered Keitarou's control over me was the same as that which caused, apparently, a group hallucination. I wouldn't say it didn't surprise me — I was certainly not expecting it. Just... perhaps... once you've been assailed by it once, your body develops some kind of reactive immunity to it reoccurring."

"So you did know how the spell was broken, yet you lied when Kikyue asked you about Ohara?" Hirata looked displeased, but Joumei shook his head.

"I didn't understand how it was done. As a scientist, understanding is vital before drawing clear conclusions," he spoke contritely. "What affected me then, affected me alone. It didn't have the power or strength to reach so many people — but if the hallucination reached beyond where we are, the chances are it reached a good many more than just ourselves. I can't explain that either, not at present. I don't know the answers to those questions, Hirata-sama. I'm sorry for my uselessness, but I don't know. I just know it worked. And, it seems, it's worked again. I can confirm that the aura that freed me and the one that caused the hallucination were, broadly speaking, the same... but at present, that's all I can say. We should simply be grateful that it took effect when it did."

"It took effect too late for Anabomi," Hirata's expression became troubled. "Although even if the spell had been broken in time to save him, I doubt very much that he would have ever recovered from its effects."

He bent to retrieve Anabomi's discarded weapon, holding it out to Hakubei, who took it, turning it over gingerly in his hands.

"Blood..." he murmured, and Hirata nodded.

"The blood of the men who lie here now," he said wearily. "Anabomi killed his men under Keitarou's control. We are quite sure of those events, and Anabomi himself led me to believe that was the case. He asked me to kill him, Hakubei-dono. I would not have done so, if not for the Hollowfication, but even if Keitarou's control can be broken, there is no cure for what was happening to his body. The shell has broken and crumbled now, as Anabomi's reiatsu dispersed, but you can see the state of him for yourself. The blow through the heart was my sword's work, but the twisted bones and split skin are the lasting proof of the mutation taking place. I don't know, as yet, what caused this effect. Before the hallucination..."

He hesitated, his eyes narrowing slightly behind his glasses.

"My men reported seeing fragmented bits and pieces of the image, at times it wasn't clear, or they lost consciousness and couldn't see all parts of it," he said slowly, "but I saw all of it in clear, cohesive order. I don't know if it had any bearing on truth, but it made me reconsider my original assumptions. I had thought that Anabomi's mutation was the result of Keitarou's reidoku. However... now I wonder if it was something else, and what we saw in that hallucination was truth."

To Sora's surprise, he glanced at Joumei as if for confirmation of his words, and the young man nodded.

"I knew of nothing else which could bring on Hollowfication in such a way," he agreed. "Nor could I think of anyone who would want to elicit such a reaction, aside from the exile, Keitarou. However, the vision may change things. I don't know Kusakawa Shougo, and I don't have any idea what work he may or may not have been doing — it's all before I was born. Scientifically, it would seem logical for both attacks to be Keitarou's doing, but realistically... perhaps it's not so simple."

“So somehow, Anabomi-taichou was doubly poisoned?” Kanshi asked, and Hirata shrugged.

“We’re still working on that theory,” he admitted. “Sora, Souryoukun, Kikyue found some additional suspicious paraphernalia in Anabomi’s office, which also adds some doubt to the idea this was reidoku — some of this paraphernalia bears a District Three crest. Keitarou has posed as a Kyouraku clansman many times, but he’s never used his family’s crest in a crime before. But it might be Shougo-dono’s.”

“Anabomi and Kusakawa were friends,” Hakubei looked shocked. “Close friends — longterm friends from before the Gotei, like Shunsui and I! Shunsui had to fight against me, but I heard him, Hirata-dono, he said that he didn’t want or intend to kill Kanshi and I if he could help it, because we were his friends. I knew Kusakawa. He was a regular enough guy who worked alongside all of us and annoyed none of us. He and Anabomi were close, and he was probably the only man outside of the Kuchiki who Anabomi ever talked to in huge depth. Are you really suggesting that Kusakawa didn’t only break Seireitei law, he also broke the trust of his closest associate, and more, mutated him into some kind of monster?”

He pulled a face.

“Not only that, are you really suggesting that he managed to murder him, in league with Keitarou — a man he actively worked to find and stop — twenty five years after he died?” He added sceptically. “Maybe Kusakawa did some stuff he shouldn’t — and I didn’t get the audio on the vision, so I’m a little fuzzy about all the whys and wherefores right now, especially with no tangible proof anything happened at all. Maybe, maybe I can believe that Kusakawa was breaking Seireitei’s rules, doing something he shouldn’t have been to further his research... something that made Minaichi ticked at him and caused an unfortunate encounter. I don’t pretend to know if his research was legal. I worked with him, but didn’t know everything that went through his mind. Anabomi would have, though. Anabomi kept Kusakawa’s memory, even to recently. We didn’t talk often, not about private things, but recently he mentioned Kusakawa and it was clear that Anabomi thought very highly of him, even now. He also thought that Kusakawa was killed by Keitarou, because Kusakawa hated Keitarou. Besides, being dead is a pretty good alibi. Are we sure this isn’t another Keitarou smokescreen against the Urahara, and releasing Kanshi and I from the spell is just to lull everyone into a false sense of security?”

"I don't believe that's the case," Joumei said softly. "I believe the spell was broken in good faith, Hakubei-dono."

"Joumei, if I find out you know something you're not telling me..." Hirata sent his companion a suspicious look, and Joumei returned it with a grave one.

"Keitarou is still here," he reminded his companion. "We should be focused on that, in case he attacks again."

"Taichou has a point though," Kanshi observed thoughtfully. "I didn't know Kusakawa, so I can't comment on his friendship with Anabomi. And I got more of the audio than Taichou, so maybe I'm a little clearer on what we were made to see. But we don't know why we were made to see it... and it's pretty difficult to murder someone, friend or not, after you've died. Even for a shinigami."

"It's all speculation at the moment," Hirata said grimly. "I don't know what I'm suggesting, Hakubei-dono, and I won't make any firm claims before the Council, not without proof in either direction. It just needs to be looked at more closely, that's all. As a Council representative, I've viewed the scene and I will make a full report, but the physical evidence needs collecting, and I feel it ought to be collected by an officer of higher rank than my daughter. I don't have a Vice Captain, so since you are both here..."

"We'll help," Sora nodded her head. "Whatever we can do. Where is Kikyue-hime now? We'll go there and relieve her, hear what she's found, and do what we can to collect evidence."

"If we're both there, it can be done and witnessed according to proper procedure," Kanshi agreed. "But Endou-taichou, before we do... one other thing is bothering me just a bit."

He got to his feet, padding back towards them and brushing the chalk dust from his hands. "Anabomi-taichou turned Hollow, and three other members of the Ninth Division are dead. The evidence of that is right in front of us. I almost hate to ask this, but... Kitabata said that there was a good chance Ninth might be without any living officers above Sixth Seat come nightfall. You also just said that you want Sora and I to go, as Seventh lacks a Vice Captain. What of Ninth's Vice Captain? Where is Mikihara in all of this?"

"Mikihara-dono is inside," It was Joumei who answered, his striking features becoming grave. "A healer is with him."

"But he's alive?" Sora pressed, and Hirata shrugged.

"At present, but for how much longer is in Shikiki's hands, and she isn't able to use her full reiryoku on him at once, because his heartbeat is so weak and his life signs so unsteady," he explained. "When we got here, we thought, on initial inspection, that he had died, but Joumei managed to find a pulse. We sent for Shikiki as soon as we were able, but..."

He shrugged.

"You'll need to pass him to get to the office, where Kikyue is," he added. "He's too unstable to be moved, apparently. I've broken the lock on Anabomi's quarters, and as soon as is possible, Shikiki wants to transfer him inside there, but for now... you'll need to take care not to get in the way. Ninth's entire structure relies on us keeping him alive. The Sixth Seat has rallied and taken charge of those lower members we located hiding on the property, but she's suffered minor injuries herself which nobody's had time to think of treating, and she's very shaken by the whole thing. She's our key witness to everything that happened... she saw the deaths of her comrades first hand, before Mikihara sent her to me for help."

He paused, then,

"The girl reported then that her Captain was being possessed, and he wanted someone to stop him. He repeated that request to me, and so I stopped him — but at a higher price than I would like. I almost wonder if..."

He trailed off, his gaze flitting back towards the body.

"If it had not been for the Hollowfication, I might well have ignored his wishes and fought to restrain him," he reflected again, and to Sora, this reaffirmation of his motives indicated that, deep down, Hirata was more shaken by the encounter than he appeared to be.. 'I know, now, that there were questions we needed to ask, relating to what we found in his office, and we might never be able to get a satisfactory answer simply from left behind artifacts. I didn't have that luxury, though. Hajime and the others will testify to it too, but that,' he gestured to the blown out front of the division, "was Anabomi's statement of intent when he first came to engage me in battle. Whatever happened, it was well underway by the time we arrived here, and he was already mutating. He'd crossed a line, and that line cannot normally be crossed back. The only solution was to kill him and end his misery as swiftly as possible."

"Like Sakanoue Heiji, in the hallucination," Hakubei murmured, and Hirata nodded.

"Eerily similar," he agreed wearily, "which is one reason why I wonder about Kusakawa's involvement in this. I have no idea whether or not the hallucination we all saw was a real reflection of the past, but since the images used to break the spell over Joumei were founded in truth, it will have to be looked into, and thoroughly. Even if the truth turns out to be unpleasant — we need to know now what it is, and how it connects to what's happened here today. The Council will have much to do to settle all the pieces, providing they get an opportunity.”

He turned to Hakubei.

“To which end, Hakubei-dono, I believe Keitarou is still in Inner Seireitei, somewhere,” he added. “He may or may not be alone, but we ought to be prepared for further attacks. If Sora and Souryou-kun are here, with Kikyue and my own people, Ninth are in safe hands for the time being. I trust someone is in command at Eighth?” this last to Sora, who nodded.

“My squad are as secure as they can be, given the circumstances,” she agreed. “They’ve been given firm instructions to stay concealed and not to emerge without clear orders to do so. Nobody knows their way around Eighth well enough to find them and catch them unawares, and I have confidence in the two officers left in charge. For the time being, Hirata, they are in safe hands.”

“Tenth are entirely out on patrol,” Hakubei added. “There’s nobody to take charge of there, just empty buildings and nothing of value to an intruder.”

“Good,” Hirata looked satisfied. “You and Souryou-kun are recovered, and Keitarou’s puppet here is dead. There is nobody of his calibre on the premises to cause further harm, and, at present, no indication of any fresh assault on Ninth Division. Whilst Souryou-kun and Sora get down to work here, Hakubei-dono, I suggest that you and I go hunting for the perpetrator for this whole business — and, if possible, remove his head from his body in the same way as he had Anabomi treat his officer. If we look, we may find him — and he’s probably more interested in killing Captains than lower officers, so our doing so is more likely to keep him from harming the subordinate officers here, at Eighth, or anywhere else in Seireitei.”

Hakubei’s eyes narrowed, and Sora saw the resolution harden within their depths. He nodded.

“I’m right behind you,” he said grimly. “Let’s go.”

Author’s Note:

Sorry for the slight delay in update this week — I've been in Cambridge studying ancient Japanese things. Also, Happy Easter to anyone who celebrates it.

69. Turning Tide

Chapter Sixty Seven: Turning Tide

“You look uncomfortable, Edogawa.”

Mitsuki raised her head from the papers she had been poring over, casting the speaker a faint smile. He pushed open the door of the open study a little further, stepping into the chamber proper and sliding the divide shut behind him. In a few strides he was standing behind her, and Mitsuki pushed the papers aside, looking quizzical.

“Madeki-dono?”

“Retsu-sama wanted me to come find you,” Madeki explained before she could ask the question, leaning up against the edge of the desk and resting his hand on the polished wooden surface. “Since you came back here, you’ve been holed up in the research rooms and study areas, going through book after book as though your life depended on it. What’s so urgent that you need to shut yourself away in here, instead of mixing with your squad-mates? Aomori’d like to see you, now she’s doing so much better.”

“Things are wrong here,” Mitsuki pulled the books she had been using towards her, closing the uppermost one with a resigned snap. “They’re a surreal kind of wrong, but they’re still wrong. You can’t tell me you don’t feel it too, Madeki-dono. Retsu-sama’s original summons for me to return came out of the blue, and now we’re not allowed to leave and the whole place is covered in a mass of Kidou spells?”

Madeki’s clever features became grave, and he nodded.

“I suppose it must seem that way, especially since you haven’t been here since the incident in Rukongai,” he said frankly. “You’ve never had an opportunity to consider Fourth your home, and Retsu-sama’s indulged your desire to take care of Ukitake-taichou’s waif and stray — but right now, here is where you should be. With Seireitei lacking in protection and with Fourth Division depleted in numbers anyway, you ought to know that Retsu-sama’s orders are completely logical. This isn’t a place which breeds fighters.”

“That’s the thing,” Mitsuki got to her feet, moving towards the window of the chamber to gaze outside on the apparently tranquil lawns of the Fourth Division’s grounds. Normally this space would be filled with convalescent officers, recovering in the fresh air, but today it was empty, and this too made her full of unease. “Why would we need fighters anyway, Madeki-dono? Why would we need so many layers of protective Kidou? The members of the Council who left here went to the Real World to hunt down Aizen Keitarou. If that’s where the danger is, why are we taking the precautions we are?”

“It is a sensible question, Madeki,” before the Third Seat could answer, Retsu herself pushed open the door, casting Mitsuki a pensive smile. “I’m sorry, Mitsuki-san. It must seem very high-handed of me, summoning you back here and closing off the Division in this way, but in the circumstances, I thought that it was best.”

“I’m not questioning your orders, Taichou,” Mitsuki said hurriedly. “What I don’t understand is why they were given in the first place. That’s all. If we’re not meant to be fighting here, why are we barricaded up like we’re preparing for a siege?”

Retsu was silent for a moment, then she nodded.

“You’re right,” she acknowledged. “It might appear an overreaction. Normally, it wouldn’t be the place of an unranked officer to question the orders of her Captain — but in your case, perhaps an exception can be made. You lack rank only because you were deployed straight to Rukongai, rather than working your way through positions here, and in this particular circumstance, you have some personal knowledge of the stakes involved. I am sure I am right when I say that once you were acquainted with Endou Eiraki?”

“Edogawa?” Madeki cast her a startled glance, and Mitsuki looked surprised, nodding her head.

“Yes, but it was a long time ago. The last time I saw her... we definitely weren’t any kind of friends.”

“No, perhaps not,” Retsu paused, pursing her lips as though considering how best to word her next statement. “Still, your personal knowledge of the enemy that threatens Seireitei — yes, that killed your fellows in Rukongai — makes your situation unique among the rest of my squad. Perhaps you understand the danger involved... and the risk that this decision may not be... the right one.”

“I beg your pardon, Taichou, but do you mean the decision to close up Fourth, or the decision to send people to the Real World after Keitarou?” Madeki was the one who voiced the question, and Retsu smiled, a sad look coming into her eyes.

“I am aware of the way in which the exile thinks,” she said lightly. “He rarely acts in the way we expect, and he has accomplices, two of which we have already fallen foul of. Whatever is in the Real World, I believed from the moment the order was given that Seireitei was potentially in danger of attack from one or more of these individuals. I have no intention of letting Fourth Division be sacked by rogues, especially since our skills may well be needed when the dust settles.”

“So we’re here, waiting for people to be killed and hurt?” Mitsuki asked numbly, and Retsu came to rest a hand on her shoulder.

“I’m sure you are sensitive enough to know that it’s already begun,” she murmured. “Even with all the barriers of Kidou blocking us from the world outside, you sense that something is in the air. There is already fighting, here. We cannot change that, Mitsuki-san. It is our job to wait and to heal, to protect the precious skills we have in order to save what lives we can. Rukongai taught me that Fourth Division are not yet an institution which can take part in combat and come out unscathed. Maybe that time will come, but for now, as a Captain, I have to make decisions that are not, necessarily, always going to be popular.”

She frowned, then,

“A short time ago, an officer from Seventh Division came to the Fourth,” she admitted. “He demanded a healer, and I allowed Shikiki to leave the confines of the Division headquarters, because a man’s life was in danger. I have concerns about doing so, but saving lives must be our priority. Only for that end will I allow people here to risk their lives. That is my choice as Captain, and an instruction I expect you to obey.”

Mitsuki pressed her lips together, casting a glance back at the desk of haphazard books, and Retsu followed her gaze, bending to pick up the nearest volume. Her eyebrows twitched up as she read the title.

“Spiritual poisoning?”

“My patient at Thirteenth,” Mitsuki admitted, and Retsu looked surprised.

“I thought you were treating the boy at Thirteenth for sword wounds?” she murmured, and Mitsuki nodded her head.

“I have been, and those are healing well, but I’m concerned about his general health in other ways,” she confessed. “I don’t know how to explain it, because I’ve never seen anything quite like it before, but he’s not eating enough, and I’m sure that he’s getting sicker, even though his wounds show no infection and are certainly not life-threatening. He seems weak, dizzy, and unstable, and I’m not sure how I can help him.”

“And so you worry about him while you are here with us?” Retsu asked gently. Mitsuki nodded.

“Koku is my patient,” she agreed. “I promised to help him and I want to, but I can’t do it from here. Retsu-sama, it’s hard to explain, but I think his life is in danger. I think that someone or something means him harm, and the healer inside of me wants to make sure he’s all right. He’s just a scared boy, really. He’s barely into adulthood, alone and far from any family he ever had. This place is dangerous for him, and he came here to try and help one of our Vice Captains. So far he’s been denied healing attention on any other level. All he has is me, and... and Taichou... I should be with him now.”

“If he is within Thirteenth, surely he’s safe enough till the risk passes?” Madeki questioned. “I understand you want to help the boy, Edogawa, but Taichou is right. I’ve sensed it too, and the report from Kitabata was clear enough. There’s been an attack on Seireitei and outside is dangerous. The chances are that we will need to be fully deployed when the hostilities end, and there’s no telling what might come back from the Real World. If there are no healers, then the wounded are as good as dead. Aomori is proof of that — without your efforts, she’d have died like the others — hell, so would I. There aren’t enough of us as it is to protect the lives of shinigami who may be hurt — you need to put it into perspective.”

Mitsuki’s brow creased and she shook her head.

“I can’t explain it, at least not right now,” she owned, looking at her Captain apologetically. “Probably, afterwards, it will all be clearer, but right now all I know is that the patient entrusted to me by Ukitake-taichou is in a lot of danger. I need to help him. Since I came back to Seireitei, helping Koku has been the thing which has helped me the most to recover myself and put what happened in the Spiritless Zone behind me. Protecting his life is important to me, because in a way, I owe him my ability to heal again. I will be careful, Retsu-sama, I promise. You let Shikiki go help, so please... let me go too. Let me go back to Thirteenth... I know Koku needs me.”

“Taichou?” Madeki’s expression was one of consternation, but Retsu sighed, a resigned smile touching her lips.

“You have become a determined healer since your days at the Academy, and I’m proud of that instinct within you,” she said softly. “You should return here safely, else I will not be able to convey upon you the rank that you obviously now have earned.”

“Retsu-sama?”

“Go to your patient like a healer should,” Retsu withdrew her hand from Mitsuki’s shoulder. “I will trust your instinct, Mitsuki-san... don’t let me down.”

“Yes, ma’am!” Mitsuki’s eyes lit up with hope and she made a hurried salute, bowing her head to Madeki before hurrying out of the room and along the hallway towards the chamber which she currently shared with two other Fourth Division officers. As she went, she could hear the fading voices of Madeki and Retsu discussing her decision, aware that Madeki did not approve, but she did not turn back. Instead she paused only to scoop up Yuuyugo, thrusting it through her obi before vaulting the window sill onto the lawns outside. Walking purposefully towards the layers of Kidou, she raised her hands, allowing her reiryoku to part the heavy defenses, and though the air sparked and hissed in protest, it did not prevent her from walking through.

Once out, the barriers sealed behind her, and Mitsuki faltered, hit by a sudden wave of clashing energies and fragmented reiryoku. She gasped, putting a hand to her chest as the sensation threatened to rob her of her breath, but then, as the bits and pieces of spirit power became more focused, she found that she recognised several of the people who had been involved. Then, overriding all of it, she sensed something else — raw and savage and yet unnervingly familiar. Her heart almost stilled in her chest, and she hurried forward, a single word dropping from her lips.

“Koku.”

As calm had descended over the Eighth Division barracks, a solitary figure had emerged from her hiding place between the ceiling beams of the old training gymnasium, pushing and pulling her dusty, dishevelled form up through the tiny gap in the loose floorboards and onto the narrow landing that separated the outer walkway from the rear of the Captain’s quarters. Inching around the outside of this hallowed chamber, into which she would never dare step without express permission, Shizuka eased herself as soundlessly as she could manage around the outskirts of the wooden structure, landing with a soft thud on the reassuring flat of the balcony that jutted out over the Eighth.

Glancing down at her body, she took in the sword that hung at her waist, her obi bulging with various powder supplies she had stolen from the division’s munition stores in case of an emergency. Against her Captain's instructions, she had slipped the command of her patrol leader, searching instead for somewhere inconspicuous to hide.

Although her real home had always been with Shunsui's half-sister, Riri, in District Eight, to Shizuka, Eighth Division had become the place she belonged. As a child, she had followed all of Riri's lessons dutifully, but when, at the age of twelve, her spirit power had first begun to manifest itself, she had jumped at Shunsui's suggestion that she come and spent some time training in Inner Seireitei. Shunsui had anticipated homesickness, but from the moment she had stepped through the doors and sensed the aura that pervaded the shinigami barracks, Shizuka had known that this was the path she too wanted to follow. The feeling had only grown when, instead of being scolded for blowing up dinner plates or setting fire to bushes, she was encouraged and praised for using the gifts she had been given. It had only been a six month spell, just enough to make her power safe, but it had been enough to tell her that this was what she wanted to do with her life. More, it had taught her that, as dearly as she loved Riri and her brother, it was Shunsui who understood her best, and Shunsui who had come to hold first place in her affections.

She had discovered the hidey-hole in the roof during her six month juvenile placement, and had often used it to her advantage as a child when she had wanted to get out of a particularly unpleasant chore. Though she was bigger now than she had been then, she was still slim and agile enough to manoeuvre her body into the tight space, and so she had pushed herself as far back as she could manage, cloaking herself with the most powerful concealment kidou that she knew how to cast. She had expected to be quickly discovered, but as the flares of reiatsu and sound of hurried footsteps had alerted her to something major going on outside, she had wriggled and crawled into a pocket of space between the beams and the outer wall, squinting through a crack to watch with growing dismay the confrontation unfolding in her squad's front yard.

It had told her beyond a shadow of a doubt that today was no ordinary day, and, from the tension rippling through her Captain's body, this was no ordinary fight. She did not know what was wrong with the members of the Tenth, or why they were attacking the Eighth Division, but she was smart enough to realise that making an indignant, impassioned entrance onto the scene would likely do nothing more than get her killed.

And so she had watched, unnoticed by the harried combatants, as the Eighth had pushed the scale and turned the fight to their own advantage. It had been at that moment that Shunsui had spoken to Sora, then disappeared into shunpo, and at his sudden disappearance, Shizuka's heart had clenched in her chest. Absorbed in the battle, she had almost forgotten her reasons for breaking rules and staying behind, but with Shunsui's disappearance, her feelings of unease all came flooding back.

Then had come the hallucination, the vivid, unescapeable images of shinigami fighting in the Rukon, Vice Captain to Hollow and Captain against Captain. The blood and rain and despair of the scene had made Shizuka dizzy and when she had returned to herself it had taken a moment to put her thoughts back in order, or remember who and where she was. By the time she had pulled herself together and fully regained her wits, the front courtyard of the Eighth Division was deserted, and everything was quiet.

Shunsui had not come back, and now her Vice Captain and her Third Seated Officer were also nowhere to be seen. This unnatural silence frightened her more than the fierce battle she had witnessed who knows how many minutes before, and as she padded cautiously across the balcony towards the railing, she reflected that she would rather face a scolding for her reckless behaviour than an empty courtyard and a silent barracks.

Was she alone? It was hard to know for sure, but something was badly, desperately wrong.

She leaned up against the railing, closing her eyes as she remembered the short, cryptic conversation she had had with her Captain the night before. It had been late, when he had returned, and he had secluded himself in his room — but Shizuka was a curious, forthright soul, and her curiosity had only been augmented on hearing that he had been to Thirteenth. Whilst this in itself wasn't an unusual state of affairs, Shunsui's demeanour on returning to his own rooms was, and it had concerned her enough to risk a scolding, skipping through the halls and knocking on the door of the Captain's office. What had transpired between them had in no way settled her heart, and her lips thinned as, little by little she replayed the encounter in her head.

At first there was no response to her knock, but she persisted three or four times more, and, reluctantly, he called her in. She pushed back the door softly, glancing behind her to make sure that nobody was watching, for Sora had already told her Shunsui had asked not to be disturbed. Shizuka pushed her luck quite often when it came to Shunsui's indulgence of her whims, but Sora was another matter, and the Vice Captain's strict, roving eye would soon suss out the younger girl's intentions, adding a fresh pile of chores to those already written in the weekly schedule.

Shizuka was a hard worker, but she didn't much like scrubbing floors or polishing swords, and especially not when Sora made her do the both at once. It had happened before, and so it was with the ultimate discretion that she had slipped into her Captain's chamber.

The room was fairly dark, lit only by one Kidou lamp, and Shunsui was lounging on cushions in the far corner, his pink haori spread out beneath him, and his white one hanging on its hook behind the door. To Shizuka's relief he had not yet changed for bed, nor did his pretence at relaxation fool her, and she frowned, shutting the door and coming to stand a few feet away from where he lay.

"Taichou?"

"Shizu-chan, I did tell Sora I didn't want to be disturbed. I'm sure she probably told you, and she won't be pleased if she knows you're ignoring her."

Shunsui's words were soft and even, not unwelcoming, but lacking his usual teasing warmth, and at the sound of them, Shizuka's eyes narrowed even further.

"She did," she admitted, "and I'm here in defiance of it. I'm sorry, sir, but I was worried about you."

"Worried?" Shunsui echoed the single word, and Shizuka nodded.

"I know you pretty well," she said earnestly, "and I know you never come back from Thirteenth looking like you did today, not even if Juushirou-dono has twisted your arm and got you to muck in with some plan of his that means lots of paperwork you don't want to do. You always breeze in and joke about palming it off on Sora-dono... but you don't come up here like this, shutting yourself away. It's not normal... you can't pretend that nothing's bothering you,"

"And if I was just tired?" Shunsui's question came languidly, and Shizuka snorted her derision, shaking her head. He was not even looking at her, she realised, the upper part of his face concealed by the straw kasa he sometimes wore about the division, and suddenly she had the impression that he did not want to look at her, as though seeing her would, somehow, cause him distress. This thought disturbed her, and her lips thinned, pressing together.

"I know you, Shunsui-nii," she repeated, using the old, affectionate nickname. "Right now you're not even meeting my gaze, and you never do that unless you're trying to lie. I know that you like to blow things off and pretend, but the more you do that, the more serious you think it is. What do you think is going on at Thirteenth Division? It's not just you who has a friend there, you know — and I'd be really cross with you if something happened to Ketsui-kun and you could've prevented it."

"You know, I'm sure we had a conversation when you first recruited here, that you were going to at least remember to call me Shunsui-dono, if Taichou was too much effort," At length, Shunsui tipped back the old straw kasa that he had covered his face with to think, his dark eyes shifting across the room towards where his Tenth Seated officer stood. "We might be alone, but that still stands. For your sake and for mine, it's better that way."

"I could call you other things, but that would be a lot more complicated for both of us," Shizuka said frankly, moving across the room and plucking the kasa from her companion's head, setting it down on the windowsill. "And now you can't avoid looking at me, I'd like it if you'd answer my question. Ketsui-kun is important to me... just like Juushirou-dono is important to you, and if you think there's something dangerous in Thirteenth..."

"Clearly there is," Shunsui groaned, pulling himself up into a sitting position and running agitated fingers through the tousled brown hair that for once scattered loose across his shoulders. "But I'm not sure it's something I should be discussing with you. It's not that I think Thirteenth is in trouble, not specifically... nor Ketsui... but..."

"Then what?" Shizuka squatted down across from him, fixing him with an expectant look. "An off the record answer is as good as any. You know I won't go spilling it to anyone else."

"I know, but there are some things that it's best not to voice aloud," Shunsui admitted. "Truth is, Shizu-chan, I don't want to get anyone involved who doesn't have to be. It could mean someone's life... and..."

"Someone's life?" Shizuka looked startled, and Shunsui nodded.

"And so it's something I want you to keep out of," he concluded firmly, reaching over to ruffle his fingers through Shizuka's own dark waves. "Be a good girl, huh, and let this one alone? Think of it as the business of Captains... and not something Riri would want you involved in."

"If she wouldn't want me to be, she'd be cross with you, too," Shizuka pointed out, folding her arms across her chest, and Shunsui offered her a rueful grin which did not reach his eyes.

"True, but it's my job," he said simply. "Now, you run along and do your job, else Sora will be screaming in my ear about how she's people short and still has to do the squad rotas for tomorrow. You'll miss your assignment if you hang around here too long."

“You’re sending me out of Inner Seireitei?” Shizuka’s eyes became suspicious slits, and Shunsui sighed.

“If I could, I’d send you all, but unfortunately, I can’t.” he admitted. “Don’t look at me like that, Shizuka. I can’t answer the questions you want to ask, and if you’re far away, then...”

“I’m Tenth Seat of Eighth Division, not the little kid you used to play hide and seek with around Riri-nee’s hut,” Shizuka shook her head. “I’m a shinigami, just like you are. Don’t send me out on patrol, Shunsui-nii. I mean it. I want to stay here. I want to be useful.”

“I want you to call me Taichou, but we don’t always get what we want.”

“Fine. Taichou, then,” Shizuka pouted, but obediently changed her mode of address, bowing down before him in an exaggerated expression of respect. “Please, let me stay here and be useful.”

“Shizu, everyone who can be sent away from Eighth has been and will be,” There was something dark in Shunsui’s gaze, and Shizuka frowned, her heart clenching at the sight of it. “Not just you. I’m keeping Sora, Tetsuya, Kaoru — maybe one or two others, but nobody below top rank and certainly nobody whose rank is in double figures. You go and you take your assignment like an adult, else we’ll have words when you come back. Your duty is to obey your Captain... and this time, I’m not going to be worked on to relent. You go and you kill Hollows. That’s your duty. Protect the people you trained to protect and leave me to deal with those I swore to. Understand?”

Shizuka sighed, but knew she was defeated, and nodded, getting to her feet.

“Yes, sir,” she said resignedly. “I’m going. I’ll go see Fukutaichou now.”

Shizuka opened her eyes, echoing that sigh with another one of her own.

Shunsui-nii is always soft on me, but not this time. This time it was something big... which means his life is in danger, and probably everyone else’s, too. Whatever happened here today... it’s something Seireitei’s not going to shrug off, and it’s probably bigger than just Eighth Division and Tenth. He didn’t say it, but it was in his eyes last night... it was a matter of life and death, and maybe... his life. His death.

She shivered as though a sudden cold wind had whipped around her body, but she knew in reality it was dread encircling her heart. Maybe I was breaking rules, but what else do you expect when you talk to me like that? If I’d left Seireitei on patrol, I might be safe from whatever it is that’s turning through the atmosphere... but I might also never see you again. And if it's something like that... then this is an order I just... can't obey. Riri-nee wouldn't forgive you if you went off and died somewhere, Shunsui-nii... and I... I won't forgive it either.

Carefully she mounted the balcony, clambering down the side with the same nimbleness that had served her well as a child, and dropping down onto the dusty cobbles. Here she could see in irrefutable detail the marks of the fierce battle but, with some relief, she noted there was little sign of bloodspill, making serious injuries unlikely. Shunsui had certainly been in one piece when she had seen him leave, she reminded herself, skipping over the broken pieces of fence and gate towards the main thoroughfare and gripping the splintered remains of the pole in her hands, peering cautiously around it for any sign of trouble. Her Captain had released his zanpakutou, but already the traces of its presence were fading, and Shizuka was sharp enough to realise that he had sealed the swords into their sleeping forms as he had sped away from Eighth. There was no sense of Sora's zanpakutou, either, nor Tetsuya's, and already the spiritual morass of energy was beginning to dissipate.

She could hear faint voices at Ninth Division — Sora's strident tones cutting through the rest, and this further confirmation that her Vice Captain was safe helped to bolster her heart.
Whatever it is, maybe it's over. Perhaps it's done, and Shunsui-nii will come back soon. Perhaps...

She was just considering returning to the barracks and preparing herself to face punishment, when an all-too familiar sensation struck through her heart, turning her blood to ice.

It was something she had seen and sensed many times during her adolescence and her training, something which, even now, filled her with both awe and and a respectful amount of fear. Yet in all the times she had felt that particular swirl of reiatsu, she had never felt such true, raw intent. A second passed, then there was another swirl of something, dark, intangible and unfriendly, rearing its head in obvious confrontation.

She gulped, swallowing hard as she interpreted what it meant.
Katen Kyoukotsu.

Her mind raced.
Katen Kyoukotsu's release. Again. He sealed it, when he left here, but Shunsui-nii is fighting again. Shunsui-nii is...
Before she knew what she was doing, she had run out into the central thoroughfare, no thought on her mind except the need to trace that surge of power and ensure that her Captain was safe. Although she knew there was little she could do as a Tenth Seat that Shunsui as a Captain could not, still she could not prevent her headlong flight, her fears from the night before now put into stark, unescapable reality. You knew. You went looking for this fight. Whatever it is, you knew last night and you didn't tell me. You tried to send me away, tried to leave Sora-dono behind, and now...

Tears blurred her vision, and she dashed them away, but more fell — tears of fear, of frustration, of desperation. She tried to shunpo, but the hallucination had sent her senses into such overload that she could not draw enough focus together to manage a single flash-step, and so she just kept running, running in the direction of the Third Division, towards a target that seemed to never come.

And then, all of a sudden, she was falling headlong.

Startled, it was all she could do to put her arms out to stop herself hitting the stone with a heavy thud, instead rolling over and grazing her arms and hands against the rough surface. She winced, cursing her clumsiness under her breath, but even as she drew her winded body into a sitting position, bending her elbow to examine the large friction burn that now adorned her delicate skin, she realised what it was she had tripped over, and her eyes widened, injury forgotten as she scrambled to her knees.

It had not been her own feet, nor a piece of random debris from the battle around Eighth. It had been a leg. A long, skinny, spindly leg, half-covered in a dusty white robe.

Not quite able to believe what she was seeing, Shizuka's gaze followed the line of the leg, realising numbly that it was attached to a body, and this body, in turn, was attached to a head, framed by a dark, muzzy halo of messy brown hair.

She shuffled closer, half afraid it was another strange hallucination, but, as she reached a tentative finger to poke the individual's cheek, the head moved slightly, and a soft, incoherent murmur dropped from his lips. He was hot and dry to the touch, Shizuka realised in alarm, quite unconscious and robed in what she could only describe as nightwear but, as she turned him over, she was aware of the heavy bandaging that adorned his skinny torso. She did not know who he was, or how he had come to be there, but she could tell that he was in serious trouble, for his breath was coming in thin, shallow gasps, and even when she attempted to lift him up, his body fell limply against her, his limbs little more than skin and bone. His fingers were red and blistered, as though something had scalded them from fingertip to palm. The right hand had been loosely wrapped around something, something haphazardly covered with a dusty piece of cloth, and as she attempted to stir him from his stupor, the cloth fell away, revealing the glittering edge of what was unmistakably some kind of sword. Shizuka reached out a hand to pick it up, but something in its aura made her pause, and she drew her hand back, turning her back on the weapon and focusing instead on the unconscious young man.

Despite her fear for Shunsui's safety, Shizuka knew she could not just leave the stranger there, unconscious on the street, when an attack might come at any time. Little by little her rationality had begun to return to her, her own foolishness running out into unknown danger magnified by the plight of the nameless, uniformless invalid she had, quite literally, fallen over. Her cheeks red at how foolish she must have appeared, she found herself glad that her companion was out cold, for at least he could not bear witness to her tears or her momentary panic. Wiping her eyes dry with the edge of her sleeve, she cast a glance at the half-covered sword.

A weapon like that suggests a shinigami. And I think... I'm somewhere near the Fourth.

She turned to verify her position, realising that she was, indeed, somewhere between the barracks of the Fifth Division and the Fourth, with its heavy, cloaking cover of Kidou. There was nobody around, the eerie, deserted nature of the streets sending fresh chills into Shizuka's young heart, but then she reminded herself that Fifth were in the Real World and Fourth rarely conducted open street patrols. If it were not for the presence of Katen Kyoukotsu, raw and angry and dead ahead of her current position, Shizuka knew she would be more convinced that everything was well. She forced her attention to return to the unconscious youth.

Maybe he escaped from the Fourth — he certainly looks like he ought to be there. I ought to do something... get someone to help him. I wonder if I can carry him — he seems light, but I don't know.

Perhaps sensing her thoughts, or disturbed by her presence, the young man let out another incoherent murmur, and, for the briefest split-second, his eyes opened, just long enough for Shizuka to see that they were as brown as her own. Unsure of what else she could do, she fumbled at her belt, pushing aside the various powders and potions she had accumulated and pulling out her water gourd, giving it a little shake. To her relief, there was still some of the liquid inside it, and gently she put it to the boy's lips, hoping that he was conscious enough to be able to drink. At first, she thought he would choke, but as the cool liquid ran into his mouth, he seemed to register its presence, drinking thirstily until the vessel was drained dry. Dropping the gourd on the ground, Shizuka unpacked the various objects stuffed into her obi, setting them down beside her as she unknotted the length of white fabric. Tearing it in half, she wound what was left back around her waist, folding the rest into a makeshift pillow and laying the unknown boy down once more on the ground.

I don't think I should leave you, in case something attacks, but if I don't go get help... and that sword... what was that sword?

“Koku!”

Before Shizuka could work out a solution to her dilemma, a fresh voice assailed them, and she turned, seeing a woman with dark hair and fair complexion staring down at them in some dismay. Before Shizuka could ask her who she was and where she had come from, the newcomer had dropped down at the young man's side, putting a hand to his brow, then glancing at her urgently.

“What happened? What happened to him? Why...?”

“Do you know who he is?” Shizuka was startled, and the woman nodded.

“He's from Thirteenth, and he ought to be taken back there, as soon as humanly possible,” she said frankly. “I don't know who you are, or how you found him, but I don't think he can stay here. He needs to be taken back.”

“He's wounded... I thought he'd come from the Fourth,” Shizuka bit her lip, glancing at the boy anew, and the newcomer shook her head.

“I've just come from there. I begged leave from my Captain to return to Thirteenth — I'm treating this boy for his injury, and I felt it important that I go back to him.” she said, her tones harried and anxious. “My name is Edogawa Mitsuki, and I'm a healer from the Fourth. This boy is my patient... and in the care of Thirteenth.”

Shizuka's eyes widened slightly as she put the pieces together, staring at Mitsuki as if seeing her for the first time.

“You're... Edogawa-san?”

“Yes, that's what I said,” the woman was clearly getting impatient, but Shizuka sighed, lowering her head.

“I'm sorry. We hadn't met, so I didn't know,” she said honestly. “I know you've been at Thirteenth, though, and that Ketsui-kun has spoken of you... also, that there was a young man there who you were caring for. This is that person, isn't it? I didn't know, but it must be.”

She offered a faint smile, though it did not fully reach her eyes.

“My name is Magaki Shizuka. I’m the Tenth Seat of the Eighth Division and my Captain has no idea I’m here,” she said honestly. “I’m probably going to be in a lot of trouble when he finds out that I disobeyed orders and came out here looking for him. I found this guy by accident, and I don’t know how he got here... I tripped over him, literally, and that’s all I know. I gave him water, because it’s all I had... I didn’t know what else I could do for him, and I was just trying to work out how to get help, so I’m glad you’re here. I’ll help you take him back to Thirteenth, if you like. I shouldn’t be here, and Shunsui-n... Shunsui-dono will be even more angry with me if he senses I’m so close, especially now he’s released his sword. I know that you were a schoolfriend of my Captain and my Vice Captain, so maybe if I help you take this boy back to Thirteenth, I won’t get into quite as much trouble for breaking bounds.”

Mitsuki offered the young woman a wry smile, shuffling herself around so that she could more easily lift the limp, unconscious young man, who Shizuka now knew was called ‘Koku’.

“All right,” she agreed. “The sooner we move, the better. It’s exposed, here, and I don’t know... there’s something in the atmosphere. Sensing Katen Kyoukotsu in release is usually a sign something major is going on, and I was concerned...”

“Mitsuki!”

The yell stopped the healer mid-sentence, and as they both raised their gazes, Shizuka’s cheeks flushed an uncomfortable red, for hurrying towards them was the Captain of the Thirteenth Division, two of his own officers in tow. She was well and truly caught in the act now, she realised, for Juushirou would surely scold her the moment he saw her, but to her surprise, he paid her little or no attention at all, instead dropping down beside the unconscious young man and putting an anxious hand to his throat.

“He’s all right, Juushirou. Just tired,” Mitsuki offered him a faint smile. “I don’t know, precisely, what he did to end up here or like this, but whatever it was, his heart is beating strongly enough that I’m not worried about moving him. Magaki-san and I were going to bring him back to you, but you pre-empted us.”

“Magaki..?” Juushirou glanced up, apparently seeing Shizuka for the first time, and the Tenth Seated officer glanced at her hands, trying to make herself as invisible as possible. “Shizuka, you’re here too? I thought...”

“Shunsui-nii doesn’t know, but I was worried about him, so I stayed,” the young woman twisted her fingers together. “I’m sorry, Juushirou-dono. I’ve probably made a nuisance of myself. I came out because I felt Shunsui-nii was fighting, and I tripped over Koku instead. I thought I should help him, then Edogawa-san came, and so...”

“Shunsui...” Juushirou’s eyes narrowed, and he turned in the direction of the Third Division, an unreadable expression in his hazel eyes. For a moment there was silence, then Juushirou let out a heavy sigh.

“Our responsibility is to get Koku back somewhere safe, and within our secure custody,” he said at length. “Kirio, Makoto, come give me a hand. Makoto, you’re stronger, so you carry the lad. Shizuka, you’d better come back with us. Mitsuki, I think Koku will need your ministrings, if you can be spared from Fourth?”

“I didn’t want to leave Thirteenth in the first place, but I couldn’t ignore my Captain’s summons,” Mitsuki said gravely, as Makoto gave his Captain a salute, hurrying to bundle the limp youngster up in his arms. “I can come back with you, though. I persuaded Retsu-sama that Koku needed me and that leaving him alone in the midst of whatever was going on outside was dangerous. It seems I was right... but aside from the burns, I can’t see any major damage done. He’s worn out, though... and I haven’t seen that before.”

She pointed to the sword, and Juushirou’s eyebrows shot up.

“But that’s...”

“It certainly looks like it,” Mitsuki agreed cryptically, her meaning foxing Shizuka completely. “Magaki-san, will you wrap it in something to keep it safe, and bring it back with us? I think it wants to stay with Koku, and I don’t imagine it would be a good idea to leave it here, where it’s in the open.”

“Yes, ma’am,” Shizuka was non-plussed, but she nodded her head, scooping up the scraps of stray cloth and beginning to do as she was bidden.

“Taichou, what is going on? Why is Koku this far out, what was that thing we all saw, and why is there so much fighting all around us?” Kirio asked softly, and Juushirou’s expression became grave.

“I’m very much afraid that Seireitei’s under assault by one of its deadliest enemies,” he said soberly. “Thirteenth may well prove to be the last force standing, if all else fails. I’ve kept you all from the fight so far, Kirio, and I’m sorry, but I’ve been waiting for word from the Onmitsukidou. It hasn't come yet, so all we can do is return to base with this boy and hope that it's enough. If we need it to be enough... and we have to actively enter the fight ourselves — we've no way of summoning help back from the Real World, so it's in our hands. Given how things are, I'm hoping it won't be needed, but in a war... things happen and it's better to be prepared for every eventuality, however unthinkable that may be. If we turn out to be the only Division left unscathed, then if we have to fight to a man — or woman — then that's what we need to be ready to do, with every potential advantage we can gather together."

He glanced at Mitsuki, then,

"He's definitely not hurt badly?"

"He's weak, and shaken up, but I'm confident he'll live," Mitsuki assured him. "I think the Thirteenth is the best place for him to be, too. Especially if..."

She paused, her eyes narrowing as though she was picking up on the waves of spirit power in the air, then she nodded.

"Especially if things go wrong and we need to negotiate," she murmured. "People have already died, Juushirou. Having custody of Koku might make or break the battle, so lets make sure he doesn't slip away from Thirteenth's protection again!"

The atmosphere in the Spiritless Zone was peaceful as Kai and his companions made their way through ferns and fields, scouring the landscape for any sign of their target. After the meeting with his two former school friends, Kai had spent some time strategising his secret mission, borrowing several secure maps from the Archive using his special status as Onmitsukidou leader to gain access to the most restricted sections. He had cross-referenced these with the maps he and his followers had compiled when making their report on the murders in Junrin'an and Hokutan, and, as a result, he had mapped out a likely path of investigation which would take them through the most populated areas of the three sectioned Districts. Following their conversation, he had also dug out the Second Division's own copies of official reports about Rukongai from twenty-five years earlier, breaking into his sister's office to obtain the papers he needed. Though Second Division depositions were included in the formal compilation, Kai's hunch had paid off, and he had managed to locate the original statements given and noted down by Second Division's deployed officers. Though their title of Onmitsukidou had only been provisional in the time before Kai had graduated and taken control of his position, they had covered more or less the same duties as the men he now led, and as he had gone through the papers, he had noticed that each statement had been signed off by the officer Kounou.

Kai was not the kind of shinigami who assumed guilt where he had no proof, and even on careful inspection, all the reports appeared to be complete and untampered with. Kounou had presented himself as a trustworthy officer until the Suzuki Naoto incident, acting as provisional head of the Onmitsukidou before Kai's inauguration and in times when Shihouin Clan duty had called him back to the main house. There was no reason to believe the man had turned to criminal endeavours before that point, nor that he had falsified any of the evidence from this trip. Kai could not connect Kounou with Keitarou, but although the reports seemed authentic, his sharp eyes had quickly picked out areas of the map listed in the deployment schedule for which no report had been received. It had taken little cross-referencing to realise that these areas had been policed by Kounou himself.

Kai had become convinced that Suzuki Naoto had been framed because of something he had discovered, but he had never really known all of the details of what that was. He had not had a chance to question the man himself, thanks to Kounou's decision to have him chased down and killed rather than brought back to face his commander in person. Till that point, it had appeared that Kounou's sins had related just to illegal trade and black market activities, but as the night had worn on, he had begun to wonder if it had not been more sinister. Re-investigating Suzuki's case had uncovered the apparently unsolved murder of the unfortunate man's mother in the time before Suzuki's own arrest. Coupled with the assassinations of other significant witnesses in Suzuki's favour, Kai had begun to be convinced that his former deputy had been involved in far more sinister dealings than had first appeared — and for a longer period of time. Kounou had never formally confessed, despite his conviction, and had never attempted to bargain with the Shihouin authorities, keeping closed-lipped about the full extent of his activities and maintaining that he believed Suzuki to be the overall mastermind. Whether Kounou had had anything to do with Keitarou's appropriation of Suzuki's injured body, or whether the man had simply been paid to look the other way by someone in Rukongai, Kai could not know, and now Kounou was dead, he probably never would. Suzuki had been a scapegoat and a victim who had ultimately turned killer and refugee, but Kai was now sure that he had probably been innocent of the original charges Kounou had put over his head. Moreover, he no longer believed that there was any coincidence in Suzuki's involvement with Keitarou's scheme. Whether Kounou had sold Suzuki to the exiled scientist for his schemes, Kai felt sure Keitarou had known, and had planned it all — from Kounou right down to the final act. And now, he had planned this just as meticulously, making himself disappear into plain sight.

Only this time they — or, to be accurate, Juushirou and Shunsui — had seen through the smokescreen to the reality beneath. Kai had left Seireitei certain that Eiraki was hidden somewhere in the shinigami's safe zone, and as they had left the Senkaimon, he had told his men that they would not return to Seireitei until they had found what they were looking for. Any grumbles had been quickly silenced by a touch of the black hilt that hung at his waist, and as a consequence, the forces had ploughed forth in relative silence.

Neither Juushirou nor Shunsui had been able to give him any guidance on which region Eiraki and her refugee son might be hiding in, but Kai's instinct had told him that it would most like be a busy area, where she and those with her would stand out least. The settlements established when the Spiritless Zone had first been inaugurated were largely intact despite the Hollow incursions faced by the Fourth Division in the weeks and months leading up to the attacks, and so he had chosen to begin with these, speaking to any stray souls they happened to meet on the way. Whilst his officers were robed all in black, Kai had chosen to wear the black robe and white sash of a regular Vice Captain, hoping that the familiar uniform would win the confidence of those residents which had known the Fourth Division officers, and so far it had paid off. Most of the residents spoke to them quite freely, unafraid of the shihakushou, and whilst a few emitted faint traces of reiatsu, the majority had no spiritual presence to speak of at all. Occasionally, however, they would come across a fearful individual, hiding behind a tree or scurrying into the safety of a nearby shelter, and this behaviour made Kai think they were not native residents.

No reason for them not to trust shinigami if they're meant to be here. Fourth's officers helped and protected them, and whilst my lot may be a lot less sympathetic and more raw around the edges, we didn't commit any atrocities during our investigations into the murders of those officers. People should not be afraid of us, so it's suspicious that some are.

He pursed his lips now, pausing at the edge of the stream to cup his hands in the glittering flow and take a sip. The sun was rising and it was a warm day, the shrinking shadows telling him that time was passing a lot faster than he would like. He did not know if Keitarou had left for Seireitei, or whether the man was hiding somewhere hereabouts, but whatever the fact of the matter, a quick wrap-up was for the best for everyone. As they had drawn deeper into Junrin'an's lush territory, the number of willing witnesses had dwindled, till large areas of apparently populated space appeared suspiciously quiet and empty. This was an immediate red flag for Kai, and as they reached the borders of a likely looking settlement, he raised his hand above his head, spreading his fingers to indicate that his subordinates should fan out and surround the location as quietly and swiftly as possible, just in case. Although this was the third settlement they had approached in this way thus far, his officers obeyed without question, melting silently into the surroundings ready to pounce should he call on them, and, drawing his weapon from its scabbard, Kai headed purposefully into the heart of the town, his quick golden gaze hunting for signs of life.

The town square was deserted, the only sound the bubbling water from fountain that marked its centre. This was a clean, well kept settlement, with cheap and simple dwellings constructed in a neat arc around what was clearly the nucleus of town life. A crumpled hat and scraps of straw indicated that people had been here until recently, and Kai narrowed his eyes, extending his senses to canvass the area for suspiciously high levels of reiryoku. At first he felt nothing, but he persevered, his efforts paying off as he centred in on a huddle of spirit masses to the north of his position. Meimei Anshi clasped tightly in his grip, he made his way cautiously forward, fairly confident that he was approaching Rukon citizens and not a hidden ambush but not trusting his instincts all the same. If Keitarou was still here, watching him, he was at risk every moment of being put under Chudokuga's control, and one of the reasons he had sent his followers so far and wide had been to limit the potential damage the sword could do. Saku had been given strict and unequivocal instructions that, should he become possessed, she was to take him out, but Kai would rather not be the second Vice Captain killed as a result of hostile action in the Rukon, and so he remained on his guard.

The target of his interest turned out to be a couple of young girls, one in her teens and the other a mere child who clung to her elder in fear as Kai approached. Both were bare-footed and dressed in ragged clothing which did not conceal how skinny they both were, nor the pallor of their skin. They shrank back in fear at his approach, and Kai paused a few feet away from them, lowering his sword cautiously so that he would appear less threatening. For a moment he second-guessed himself, for the children appeared too young to have come from the abandoned areas of the Rukon, but from the terror in their eyes, he felt certain his original hunch was right. Whether Keitarou had continued to recruit spiritually tainted youngsters for some kind of experiment he knew nothing about, or whether they had fled from safer territories when their spirit power had erupted was hard to tell, but they were so different from the content Pluses he had encountered thus far that he was sure they were part of Keitarou's illicit brood. Perhaps they had even been born in the forbidden lands — children like Keitarou's own offspring whose parents' spirit power had allowed them to do the unthinkable and reproduce behind the Sekkiseki wall.

"I'm not here to hurt you," he said softly now. "We're not here for that purpose. We're looking for someone, and if you can help me, then I'll be on my way."

The girls exchanged frightened looks, but neither one of them spoke, and Kai frowned, assessing this reaction with all of his usual care.

"Your silence tells me as much as your words," he added levelly. "You both have reiryoku, and you shouldn't be here. Should you?"

At this, the younger girl scuttled behind the elder, who attempted to stand firm, despite the terror surfacing in her eyes.

"Well?" Kai prompted, and the older girl took a gulp of air into her lungs.

"Will you send us back?" she whispered, and despite himself, Keitarou felt sorry for the wretched youngster. She was younger than him, barely fifteen or sixteen, yet her appearance indicated she had experienced hardship in her short life, and Kai realised how right his friends had been. Keitarou had found people who needed him, and therefore had used them in whatever way he had needed to keep his family safe. He shook his head.

"We're not here to do that," he said matter-of-factly. "We came because we learned that people here were in some kind of trouble, and that some needed help. You're in no danger from us, providing you don't try to get in our way."

The younger girl poked her head out at this, eyeing the Onmitsukidou uncertainly, and Kai offered a rueful smile.

"You don't believe me," he observed, "but I don't mind. I suppose my running in here with a sword probably doesn't give you confidence. I'm looking for the people who brought you here, but you're not going to tell me where to find them, are you?"

The older girl hesitated, and Kai felt certain she was going to keep her silence, but, to his surprise, the younger girl emerged hesitantly from her hiding place, moving a few paces away from the older girl until she stood directly before Kai's position. Though clearly afraid, she met his gaze bravely.

"We are supposed to be here," she said firmly. "We belong here. All of us belong here. You can't do anything about it, even if you do have a sword."

"I already told you that I don't intend to do anything to you," Kai knelt down so that he was on the young girl's level, sliding the sword into his scabbard and reaching out a hand towards her. She flinched back, and out of the corner of his eye, Kai saw the older girl back away, preparing to flee the moment his attention was off her. He pretended to ignore her, instead focusing his attention on the younger child.

"Friends of mine were murdered here," he added. "We're looking for the people who killed them. So long as they're here, other people might get hurt. We're not here to interfere in the Rukon."

"You have a sword," the younger girl protested. "Why should I believe you?"

"Have you ever seen a shinigami hurt anyone with a sword, here?" Kai asked gently, and the young girl faltered, then shrugged.

"No," she admitted, "but I've heard. Keitarou-sama..."

She faltered, putting a hand to her mouth as though she had realised too late that she had made a mistake, but Kai grinned, patting her lightly on the shoulders.

"I know about Keitarou-sama," he said ironically. "I don't suppose he's here? I'd like to speak to him about this. I think he might be a witness in the crime I'm talking about."

The young girl looked momentarily confused, then she shook her head, apparently relaxing at Kai's cryptic response.

"He's gone," she admitted. "He went away somewhere. I can't tell you where he is. I don't know."

"I see," Kai's eyes narrowed, a quick glance across the square telling him that the older girl had taken her chance to escape, and he nodded, getting to his feet. "In that case, I won't bother you any more. You want to go get water, don't you? Go ahead."

The girl bit her lip, then,

"I'm hungry," she admitted. "The other souls, they think it's silly, and there isn't a lot of food now we're here, though it's better than before. Do you know a place where we can get more food? I thought Keitarou-sama went to get food, but he hasn't come back yet."

"I promise that, when I go back to my friends, I'll try and find a way to bring you food," Kai assured her, fumbling at his obi for his own pack and carefully unwrapping the knotted cloth. He pulled out an onigiri, and the girl's eyes became huge at the sight of the fresh, clean rice.

"Here," Kai held it out to her with a grin. 'For now, you can take this. I can eat when I go back, but you've been helpful and I want to do something helpful in return. Take it,' as the girl hesitated. "It's yours. I don't want you to do anything else for me. Just run along home. You're not in any kind of trouble."

To his surprise, the girl's face broke into a huge beam, and she took the onigiri carefully in her tiny, fragile fingers.

"Thank you, Shinigami-san," she said sincerely. "I didn't mean to be rude to you. I didn't know you were a nice shinigami. People here said there were nice shinigami, but I didn't believe them. Now I do."

With that she skipped off towards the direction of the fountain, and Kai watched her go, a pensive smile on his lips.

A little kindness goes a long way. Edogawa, I'm grateful for the rapport Fourth built up here in these places. Winning over the neglected interlopers might not be as hard as it first appeared. In the meantime, though, the older girl has probably gone to warn whoever is here. And, now I know her reiatsu, and she clearly doesn't know how to suppress it, I can follow her. Hopefully she'll lead me to where I need to be, and it won't be too dangerous.

Pulling Meimei Anshi from its sheath once more, he disappeared into shunpo, tracking the traces of the older girl's potent, raw reiatsu across the settlement towards the outskirts. As he drew closer, he became aware of a second presence, muted and faint, but unmistakably familiar to his senses, and he slipped out of the flash-step behind the reassuring wall of a nearby house, peering around the wooden slats as he sought out the source of the sensation.

At the edge of a plot of freshly dug soil, a woman was kneeling. Her clothing was simple, her dark hair tied back in a tail with a length of ragged ribbon, and she was apparently oblivious to his presence. Suppressing his reiryoku to its lowest level, Kai took in the appearance of this figure, observing how she had aged since the last time they had met. Time had not been cruel to her, he reflected, especially considering she had been in hiding for most of her adult life. Had she birthed her children here in Rukongai, without medical care and attention? It seemed likely, but though he recognised her, there was little of the fragile, delicate hime left in Eiraki's resolute aura. She had chosen her path, and, as she put her hands together in apparent prayer, Kai realised that there was no sense of regret in her bearing. His gaze strayed to the recently turned earth, and he frowned, recognising it as a simple burial place. As he continued to observe, he saw the girl he had trailed slip cautiously out of the shadows, flitting across the ground to where Eiraki knelt. The older woman raised her head at the girl's approach, and though words passed between them, Kai was too far away to make out what they were. Eiraki got to her feet, saying something back to the girl, who nodded fervently before disappearing back into the safety of the village. Brushing the dirt from her robes, Eiraki cast a glance around her, clearly looking for any sign of danger, and Kai paused for a moment to check where his companions were. As he had hoped, they were closing in on his location, trailing his movements from a safe distance in case of need, and so he stepped out from his hiding place.

"Eiraki-hime," he said softly, and Eiraki swung around to face him, her expression unreadable as she took in his unsheathed sword and the black and white of his shinigami uniform. There was a moment of silence between them, then,

"Shihouin Kai-dono," her words sounded almost resigned, rather than surprised, and Kai paused a few feet from the fresh grave, his gaze running over it once more.

"Someone you knew lies there?" he asked lightly, and Eiraki's eyes narrowed, a flash of pain and anger entering her expression. It was gone the next moment, the calm mask back in place, but Kai had seen it and had understood. Though she had not the spirit power of her kinsfolk, Eiraki was still an Endou, and he should not expect her to behave like the scared child he had met almost thirty years ago at Shunsui's brother's wedding. Most likely she had sent the girl to the village to fetch reinforcements, maybe even the son who had attacked Seventh Division so ruthlessly, and Kai's eyes darted briefly to the perimeter, assessing how close Saku and the other Onmitsukidou hovered.

"That's no business of a shinigami," Eiraki's response came eventually, and she turned her back on the earth, dusting her hands once more against her clothing. They were trembling, ever so slightly, Kai noted, but she made no attempt to run away. "This is a long way from home for a Shihouin, isn't it? I thought the Fourth Division patrolled here."

“Unfortunately for you, things have changed,” Kai said evenly. “I’d like it if you’d come with me of your own accord, Eiraki, but I get the feeling that won’t happen, will it?”

Eiraki’s lips twitched into a strange, cold smile, and she shrugged.

“This is my land, not yours,” she said cryptically. “You might have come here looking for me, but sometimes shinigami die in the Rukon, Kai-dono.”

“Yes,” Kai’s expression became grave. “Yes, they do. Young men like your nephew, struck down in his prime.”

Eiraki’s eyes flickered again, and Kai saw her cast a brief glance back at the freshly turned earth.

“This is a war,” she said softly. “We all make sacrifices when we choose sides. My brother chose his. I chose mine. He lost his son. I lost my daughter. Don’t expect me to cry for a nephew I never met, not when my youngest’s body rots beneath the earth here.”

So the grave belonged to Keitarou’s homicidal daughter. Kai added this to his mental database, nodding his head.

“I don’t expect you to do anything of the sort,” he said frankly. “I’m sure it’s a long time since you cared what Hirata did or what he’s been through since you decided to leave the family home. You’re right that you made your choices, but those choices come as a cost. There is never a time limit on arrests for murder, Eiraki. Even if I can’t place a weapon in your hand for the death of Souja or any of my other comrades, the charges relating to Kuchiki Ribari still remain.”

“Kuchiki Ribari,” Eiraki’s features twitched into a mask of bitter amusement. “A rich, pampered brat who probably had nothing to give this world except more hate and discrimination. The Clans let people starve and suffer while they compete for top positions. I saw that with my own eyes in District Seven, and so I chose to leave. I chose to kill Ribari-dono and I don’t care who knows that I did. If you think you can negotiate with me or plead to my better nature, you’ll be here a long time.”

“I don’t expect an Endou to have a better nature,” Kai replied honestly. “Not an Endou who kills a child and feels nothing for their death.”

“I’m sure my brother is no different, not now,” Eiraki seemed unconcerned, but from the fleeting glances she made towards the edge of the grassy area, Kai knew she was stalling, waiting for some kind of reinforcement. “He’s an Endou too, and I’ve seen it, in his eyes. The hawk inside him is a killer. He'd kill my son just as quick as my daughter killed his. It's who we are. Even a Shihouin can't begin to understand."

"No, but we can go in search of justice for those killed," Kai raised his free hand, and silently, Saku, Karaki and the other Onmitsukidou officers began to melt out of the shadows, edging the perimeter of the field one by one. "I didn't come alone, and I didn't come intending to negotiate with you. My orders are to bring you back — dead or alive, but alive is probably preferred. Guren-sama would like to have justice for his son, and we would like to make sure no more Clan sons are murdered by unknown poisons."

"Like I said, this is my land," Eiraki smiled, and there was a rustle from the bushes behind her. Expecting the missing son, Katsura, or the Onmitsukidou, Suzuki, Kai was taken aback to realise that those who had come to Eiraki's defence were men and women of the local area, individuals with recognisable reiryoku and the same skinny physique as the two young girls he had encountered earlier. Each one of them held a crude weapon of some sort — knives, swords, even farming implements and planks of splintered wood. Out of the corner of his eye, Kai saw Karaki tense, preparing to fight, and he spread his arms out to prevent a full on charge.

"We're not here to fight with or hurt the people in Rukongai," he said firmly. "We're here to arrest those whose names have been indicted for murder, not commit our own."

"I thought so," Eiraki's expression was triumphant. "You won't kill the ordinary folk, will you? But they won't stand down unless I tell them. They are my people — like family to me. Just as I would never betray them, they won't betray me."

An ugly smile touched her lips.

"My children were birthed in the Rukon," she added coldly. "The women of the Rukon were the first people those children met. Women bond in ways you can't understand, Kai-dono, when faced with the ultimate challenge. My husband and I did what your people failed to do. We fed and clothed them, and kept them alive. You might think them worthless, but I disagree."

"On the contrary, we want to help them," Kai pressed his lips together in frustration, noting how the Rukon citizens had closed in around their leader, preventing a direct assault. "The reason we didn't know they were here is because your husband — as you call him — paid a shinigami to look the other way. If we had found them, we would've helped them then. You kept them in poverty by concealing them and making them accessories to your crimes."

"Do you really think I'm foolish enough to fall for that rhetoric?" Eiraki snorted, and Kai let out a heavy sigh.

"Where is your son?" he asked softly, and Eiraki's eyes became slits.

"Which son?" she prevaricated. "I h ave more than one, Kai-dono. Or didn't you know that?"

"I know," Kai said dismissively. "I meant your older son. Katsura, or whatever his name is. The one who manipulates Hollows and assaults Gotei Divisions in his free time. I don't need to know the whereabouts of the other one. He's already in Gotei custody."

"You're lying!" For the first time Eiraki looked rattled, and Kai smiled, shaking his head.

"Kohaku is in the protective custody of the Gotei," he repeated. "Currently, he lives, but the Council have a Kill on Sight order and his life is by no means secure."

"It's a ruse," Eiraki's expression was one of suspicion. "You couldn't catch Koku... you couldn't hold him, even if you thought you had! You don't understand..."

"I understand," Kai broke across her. "Your son has interesting talents, Eiraki-hime, but so do my friends. Kohaku sees the future, doesn't he? He sees pictures of things to come, and sometimes, he makes other people see them, too. I haven't had the fortune to meet the lad myself, but I've heard all about him. A young man barely into adulthood, skin and bone, with brown hair and brown eyes. Not an Endou, nor an Urahara, but something between the two — a genetic match so indistinct you might think that he wasn't your child at all — except that I know that Aizen is a Kyouraku name, and I know the Kyouraku often display those features. Well, does that still sound like a ruse to you? Tell me I haven't just described your second son— the man in my comrade's custody, awaiting final Gotei judgement."

Despite herself, Eiraki blanched, and Kai pushed his advantage home, gesturing to his subordinates to move closer until the area's escape routes were completely blocked off.

"So, here are the terms I've come to put before you," he said conversationally, sheathing Meimei Anshi and folding his arms across his chest. "I'm a Shihouin, and so I never enter a negotiation without a dirty trick or two to make sure things go my way. Your Clan has its traits, mine has other dark shadows of its own. Kohaku's life is not safe, not at the moment. Right now, he's not guilty of any crime we know about, but that doesn't mean he won't be indicted if you refuse to comply with my instructions now. I don't want to hurt your Rukon satellites. I know they are pawns and not the real villains, and harming them goes against my intentions. Kohaku, on the other hand, is tainted blood. You can stay here and you can resist me all you like, but time is ticking away."

"My husband will get to Koku before you can do anything to him, and then Seireitei will be sorry," the calm mask broken, Eiraki's feral nature was beginning to surface, and Kai shrugged.

"I imagine Keitarou will have enough to be going on with, judging by the fact some pretty powerful opposition is primed and waiting for him in Seireitei," he said, keeping his tones as nonchalant as he could manage. "Your son is injured, though. Weak. Ill. He won't stand a chance without someone protecting him. I can provide that protection. I have the influence to do it. I can ensure your son lives through this... but in return, I want to take you back with me. I want you to surrender yourself to me, Eiraki-hime, and come back without a fight. Your life for Kohaku's. A guilty life for an innocent. As a mother, will you let your son die to preserve your own life?"

"Do you think you can really stop my husband?"

"I know we can," Kai knew he was outright lying now, but he kept going all the same. "The spy that you have in the Gotei is a double-agent and has been secretly feeding the Onmitsukidou information since your children first killed officers in the Spiritless Zone."

"You're lying!"

"Am I?" Kai offered her a benign smile. "Well, if so, answer me this. If your spy wasn't also my spy, how did I know to come here to find you today, when Keitarou set such a nice paper trail to the Real World in order to convince us that you were all hiding out there?"

He fumbled at his belt for a pair of spirit cuffs, holding his left hand out to his companion.

"If you surrender to me, I promise you that I will do what I can to repeal the Kill on Sight order and ensure your son lives," he said softly. "Even Shihouin have honour of a sort, Eiraki-hime. I can't promise you your life. I suspect that it's forfeit, and I know, so do you. But Kohaku, I can speak for. Kohaku has killed nobody. Kohaku I can save. If you cooperate with me now."

Eiraki's eyes narrowed to slits, as though considering his words, and for a while Kai was not sure that his ruse had succeeded. After a while, however, she let out a heavy sigh, raising her hands and spreading them to disperse the gathered Rukongai citizens.

"Eiraki-sama?" One of the nearest men looked anxious, and Eiraki shook her head.

"Go back to your homes," she said softly. "Go back there and wait. It will be all right. You'll see."

Slowly, and not without hesitation, the men and women drew back, lowering their weapons and dispersing in the direction of the local settlement, until Eiraki was left alone in the middle of the green area. She bent for a moment, resting a hand on the disturbed earth, and Kai saw her lips move silently, as though conveying a message to the grave's occupant. Then she stood, and, with very bad grace, held out her hands. Kai tossed the spirit cuffs to Karaki, who took them, moving to confine the prisoner, and though there was mutiny and murder in the girl's pale blue eyes, she did not resist his touch against her skin.

Kai let out his breath in a rush.

"Saku, I want you to take charge of Eiraki-hime when we return to the Real World. Whatever her crimes, she remains a hime of blood and ought to be attended by a female officer," he said wearily. "Karaki, I want you to help make sure that she doesn't slip our hold on the way back to the Gate. Don't be too rough with her. She has surrendered to us and we will treat her as a surrendered prisoner ought to be treated. She has not yet faced trial for her crimes, and we aren't the ones passing judgement on her today."

Karaki clicked his tongue against his teeth in obvious disappointment, but he nodded, and, flanked by the two officers, Eiraki was led away towards the main town thoroughfare.

Kai lingered behind for a moment, glancing up at the sky.
Well, Ukitake. Well, Kyouraku. This is one for you, as your hunch was right on the money. I only hope I'm in time. The sun's moved again, and I've no idea what might have happened in Seireitei in my absence. I bluffed a lot about Keitarou and the spy, but I don't know for sure what will happen when he descends on our home. The fact he's not here means he's almost certainly arrived there. Let's just hope that having Eiraki-hime in custody will turn the scale if it comes down to a matter of hostage negotiation. There's still a son whose whereabouts is unaccounted for, and even if I'm willing to give up the chase for Suzuki, the older Aizen boy is still a concern. Still, I can't risk waiting around for him to try and rescue his mother. All I can do is go back — and just hope that its enough.

70. Nemesis

Chapter Sixty Eight: Nemesis

It was no illusion.

The slim figure pulled himself cautiously up into the branches of a nearby tree, tucking himself up against the trunk and leaning his head back against the wood, closing his eyes. The fragments of reiatsu were distant and faint, probably nonexistent to one who didn't know what they were sensing, but to him they were a beacon, sending out a signal loud and clear.

Kohaku had decided to use his power.

Katsura let out a heavy sigh, opening his eyes in resignation. Absently his hand went to his chest, touching the ribs that Mitsuki had healed using Yuuyugo's release so many days before. They were still tender to the touch, but his body had mended and quicker than he had expected it to. The shinigami would probably keep searching for him, but he had not sensed any of them on his trail in the last forty eight hours and, at last, he had begun to think he could relax.

Then, that day, he had sensed his brother's spirit rise, and he knew that the game was on.

His lips thinned, his gaze drifting across the skyline towards where he could just make out the tallest roofs of the buildings within Inner Seireitei. Nostalgia made him long to try and reach his brother, make contact that one last time, but he knew that it was too dangerous. One hint could give Kohaku the clues to put together Katsura's location and direction of travel, and that would be bad for both of them. Kohaku would not betray him, Katsura knew that, but the knowledge would put his younger brother in danger again, and that was something he did not want. Mitsuki had not given him back his life to chase after the past. She had given it to him in the hope he would craft a new future, and that future would be far away from anyone and anything he had known before, even, perhaps, living under a different name.

Aizen Katsura would have to disappear, and that meant maintaining the severance of ties with Kohaku, even though it hurt.

He sighed again, lowering his hand from his chest. Though he was far from the action, he knew only too well what was taking place. He had seen it, many times before, in his younger brother's thoughts and dreams. Slowly he turned his mind back to the first few weeks and months of their acquaintance. He had gone almost daily to the little hut that had been his brother's home, reaching out to him through the bars. Keitarou had told him that Kohaku had not spoken a single word until he had met Katsura, and that had always given the older boy a sense of warmth and pride. Kohaku's first word had been, "Oniichan", and it had been the cementing of a bond which had gone both ways and on many different levels. Kohaku had seen the world outside through Katsura's memories, but Katsura had seen something else... things he had never discussed with anyone, not even Kohaku himself.

And now, with the fragments of his brother's reiatsu dispersing on the wind, Katsura knew that the time had come.

He smiled, a sad, bittersweet smile.

Like I said to Mitsuki, my colours and yours are nailed to different masts. I don't hold it against you, Koku-kun. Perhaps I should. Perhaps I never should have let us become close in the first place — or maybe I should have told you the things I saw in my nightmares, the days before we met. I didn't know about you, then. It wasn't till later that I knew those were pieces of the puzzle, and as time passed, I'd see more of them. Still, at least it means I don't have to wonder about how it ends. I don't have to ask how it happened... because I've always known.

He reached up to the branch over his head, pulling himself up yet higher and disturbing some nesting birds as he found himself a better viewpoint, seeing the faint tendrils of smoke hazing over Inner Seireitei.

This was the reason you were born. I don't know if Father realised, and just didn't talk about it, or if he didn't, but I did. As I got older, I knew only too well. I didn't lie when I said I wanted you to have a life in Seireitei, little brother. I didn't lie, because I believed you were destined to have it. Bit by bit, I've understood everything. Floating between life and death, before Mitsuki healed me, a lot of old images came back to the forefront of my mind, potent answers to questions I'd forgotten and conversations from long, long ago. Well, Father wanted you to use your power to change this world, and I suppose you will. Or, probably, you already are. In this way, and this way alone, you are like Father. You've found the tools you need to help you complete your goals, just like he does whenever he releases Chudokuga.

He let out his breath in a rush, tears glittering on his lashes.

Stay safe, little brother. For your sake, I pray we never meet again. They'll look after you, Mitsuki and her friends — you belong with them, more than you ever did anywhere else. I'll miss you, and I hope you'll miss me, but it will be all right. So long as we're both still alive... that's what counts.

"I'm surprised at you,"

In the debris-scattered rear courtyard of the Third Division, Shunsui spread the scimitar blades of his zanpakutou, casting his opponent a pensive glance. Keitarou stood only a matter of feet away, the grey cloak flapping against the rough black fabric of his hakama and an unreadable expression on his clever features. Clashed in his hand was Chudokuga's hilt, the sword's blade glittering with an eerie light, and though he had never faced the weapon in any kind of release before, Shunsui knew that his companion had consciously put the sword into shikai. Not a single word had passed Keitarou's lips, an indication of the level of attack of which his sword was capable, but there was no mistaking the intent in the older man's aura.

"I had thought you didn't engage in face to face combat, not on the normal level," Shunsui continued now, flexing his fingers around the hilts of first Amaki, then Seibara's blades and feeling the prickles of energy that resonated from them. "I should consider this an honour, I suppose."

"I am not a soldier. I never trained that way," Keitarou glanced at Chudokuga's glittering surface with a sigh. "Perhaps you think that makes me unable to defend my life or my cause — but you'll soon realise that's a misnoma. I do have offensive abilities with this sword, Kyouraku Shunsui. And if pushed, I can use them."

"Everything about your sword is offensive to me, so that's no surprise at all," Shunsui's expression twitched into a humourless smile. "I saw Suzuno-chan's body, twenty six years ago, when you decided to use that to impale her through the throat and the heart. I've wanted to ask you for a long time... did you do that to spite me, because I wounded you, or out of some sick fetish of your own for shedding a young woman's blood?"

"A sick fetish?" Keitarou stared, then let out a chuckle, shaking his head in clear amusement. "Perhaps you're confusing me with someone else. Yourself, maybe. I know you have quite a reputation with the ladies of District Eight... which was quite informative for me when I was looking for the illegitimate offspring of your father. Seems some things ran in the Kyouraku family... so I can see why you'd take that opinion."

His lips thinned, his eyes becoming cold.

"But you're wrong on both counts," he said softly. "You weren't important enough then for me to care about spiting you by killing your friend, nor was she important enough for me to let her live. She served her purpose, and when she had done so, I disposed of her. Witnesses are bad things when you have bigger plans. The fault was hers... nobody asked her to intervene.”

“She was a good person who chose to help the wrong man,” somehow Shunsui kept a hold on his temper at this callous observation, knowing that Keitarou was deliberately baiting him in order to make him act rashly. “She didn’t deserve to die for that mistake, nor did Naoko-chan deserve to suffer under your control.”

“Naoko-chan, too?” Keitarou arched an eyebrow. “Suzuno-chan, then Naoko-chan? It seems your fondness for a pretty young girl hasn’t faded any with age... maybe I should’ve been searching District Eight for your illegitimate offspring, not your father’s. I’d wager, judging by your reputation in the sleaziest parts of the local towns, that there must be quite an army of little Kyouraku bastards running around.”

“Perhaps there are,” Again, Shunsui kept a hold on his temper, though it was a fight. “Perhaps I’ve been secretly training them into an army to destroy you and yours. You can bait me all you like, Keitarou, but I’m not going to rise to your barbs. I didn’t come here to discuss my past with you. I came here to kill you — which I think you know full well.”

“I do,” Keitarou’s sword glittered, the blade separating into threads of steel which wavered and twisted above the hilt as though drawn there by invisible strings. They shimmered with light, like threads of a spider’s web, and Shunsui knew at once that it was these fine threads which had taken Suzuno’s life all those years before.

“Yes, you see, my sword isn’t just a puppeteer,” Keitarou followed Shunsui’s glance, nodding his head. “This is just a shikai attack, but its the shikai attack of a sword which has Bankai. A Bankai that once controlled your dear friend, Juushirou, and which has made countless people kill and die. You shouldn’t underestimate a man who prefers to fight in the shadows... I know you control the shadows, if you want to, so this time, I’ll fight in plain sight.”

He swung his arm down, and the threads disappeared completely from Shunsui’s vision. A whistle of air past his cheek, however, followed by the sensation of pain and the cold trickle across his skin told him that they had done nothing of the sort. He raised his sleeve, wiping his cheek on the clean white fabric and coming away with a smear of blood. Keitarou chuckled.

“That was just a test run, to show you that I’m not the neutered force you believe,” he said quietly. “My threads aren’t easy to see, not when they release like that. My spirit power benefitted quite unexpectedly in a lot of ways from ingesting reidoku twenty five years ago. My legs may not be as strong as they once were, but my ability to fight is much improved. The threads of my sword are now more or less invisible, even to the keenest eyes. There are hundreds of them, and they are sharper than needles. They can run you through before you even have time to react. Maybe even penetrate the fine blades of your zanpakutou. Katen Kyoukotsu, I believe it was called?”

He twitched the hilt of his weapon, sending the threads skimming through the air once more, and Shunsui hopped back, swinging his left blade up to meet the main thrust of the attack just in time to prevent it searing through his haori to the heart and lungs beneath. At first he thought he had cut through the offending threads, but as he tried to lower Seibara’s weapon, he felt a little tug of resistance. He cast Keitarou a sharp glance, seeing the smile that had now crossed the scientist’s face. With another tug, Seibara was yanked free from his grip, careening through the air and landing with a deep thud in between Nagesu’s cobbles.

“I told you not to underestimate me,” Keitarou observed lightly, giving the hilt of his sword a little shake, and Shunsui saw a faint slither of light slide across Seibara’s blade, as his enemy withdrew the puppet threads that had separated them. “One sword down. Now it’s a fairer fight, don’t you think?”

“I don’t think you understand the meaning of the words, fair fight,” Shunsui gathered his wits, gauging the distance that separated him from his missing sword. “I don’t need two swords to fight a man with no proper training. Also, you won’t use that skill again. I know it, now. I can act against it.”

“Can you?” Keitarou arched his eyebrows. “Can you fight against a technique you can’t see? At this rate, I’ll not even need to try my Bankai on you. You disappoint me so far, Shunsui-dono. Or is it that you can’t fight me without the shadows to walk around in?”

He gestured with his left hand.

“Here is in full sun,” he observed. “There’s very little gloom for you to work with. Maybe your choice of battlefield neutered your ability to attack. That would be an irony, wouldn’t it? If I defeated you because you decided to fight me here.”

“It’s more ironic to hear a scientist predicting results without accurate evidence to support his hypothesis,” Shunsui said blackly. “Enough talking. I know you’re stalling for time. This Gate is broken, and you can’t do anything until Nagesu-sama and the others return. You don’t want to fight me, so you’re toying with me, trying to play out as much time as you can so you can effect some kind of escape and turn tables back in your favour. I’m not stupid — I know what you have planned. Unfortunately I’m not in the mood to sit back and take things slowly, not today.”

“Then you’d better improve your game, because I can continue my plans over your dead body if need be,” Keitarou returned calmly. “There isn’t a single Senkaimon in Inner Seireitei whose location I don’t know and whose technology I can’t appropriate. Nagesu was foolish, basing so much on my work. It gave me a key to whatever door I choose to open. This one might be broken, but it’s far from the only pathway. If you really want to stop me, you need to up your game.”

“Game, huh?” Shunsui pursed his lips, and he nodded his head. “All right. But you might regret it. You should be careful what you wish for... it’s dangerous to attack an opponent you don’t fully understand.”

“That goes both ways,” Keitarou flicked his arm in Shunsui’s direction once more, sending the needle-sharp threads flying across the air between them once more. Though he could not see them, this time Shunsui knew that they were aimed for his right blade, in order to fully disarm him, and he snorted, shaking his head.

“I told you, twice won’t work on me,” he said categorically, passing his sword from his right to his left hand and giving it a little tap with his right thumb. It began to spin around in a circle, faster and faster, and Shunsui pressed his right palm to the back of the blade, muttering the words to the incantation.

“Hadou no Gojuu Hachi, Tenran!” he exclaimed, and a whirl of air burst out from Amaki’s spinning blade, swirling outwards in a perfectly controlled miniature tornado. Broken pieces of charred wood and mangled metal were sent clattering across the yard, and Keitarou cursed, pulling back his sword’s attack before the barbs could fly out of control and get caught and tangled together. Taking advantage of his opponent’s momentary distraction, Shunsui slipped into shunpo, re-materialising alongside Seibara’s sword and scooping it up in his right hand. Deftly he swapped the weapons over, casting the annoyed Keitarou a benign grin.

“Sometimes having one sword gives options that having two doesn't," he said lightly. "I told you, I learn fast. Once, you might take me off guard, but twice, it's not going to happen. You'll have to find another way to tackle me... or didn't you know that I was trained in all the arts of a shinigami, not just to fight with a sword?"

"I know you're a nuisance and you've always been one," Keitarou's expression darkened, his fingers running absently through the separated threads as though protecting them, though Shunsui wondered whether he was in fact untangling them. "I should have killed you a long time ago."

"You're assuming that you would have been able to," Shunsui said evenly. "You tried, unless I miss my guess. Turned my best friend on me. Sacrificed the life of a perfectly innocent shinigami officer the second time. Today you turned another friend against me, but still you failed. Perhaps you just can't kill me, Keitarou. Perhaps that's just how it goes."

"I hope you don't think I'm fool enough to fall for that," Keitarou whipped his arm down suddenly, acting at speed in order to take Shunsui off guard, but the Eighth Captain's reflexes were primed and ready now, and he leapt back, swinging first his left then his right blade across in front of him to stir up the morass of reiryoku and broken reishi.

"Bushougoma!" he exclaimed, and both swords cut neat arcs through the air, creating curves of energy that spun out like the blades of a propellor. The sudden thrusts of energy knocked Keitarou backwards, the man only just managing to keep his footing on his damaged leg. For the first time Shunsui could see clearly the threads that led back to the sword, the thicker blasts of air having made them easier for him to see. Darting forward, he sliced Seibara's blade through the ones he could reach, and the fibres fell like locks of cut hair onto the cobbles below. He swung Amaki's sword forth to repeat the exercise with the right hand threads, but Keitarou had seen the danger and he pulled back again, disappearing into shunpo and rematerialising on the other side of the damaged Senkaimon. In the process of doing so, he had re-sealed his blade into one sword and, though a good section of the left side was cut away, Shunsui realised that a substantial amount of its spiritual form still remained.

"Clever," Keitarou gave Chudokuga a little shake, casting his opponent a rueful look. "I see you've learned to play with wind as well as shadow since last we met. Maybe I shouldn't be surprised, since the Clans are always so full of hot air."

"With that level of flattery, I'm amazed you never thought to enter Court society,” Shunsui returned lazily. “I told you already that I’m not interested in a fight that simply kills time. If you’re done prancing around with spider webs, I’d like to start a real fight now, please.”

“And give you the advantage? You must think I’m simple.”

“Deluded, actually, but there’s probably a fine line,” Shunsui tapped his swords pensively against each other, then, “all right, then I have another suggestion. I realise that, if we carry on like this, time will tick by. You’ll keep trying to stall me, and that doesn’t suit me at all. But I know you’re smart. Too smart to be lured into a battle of blades without any proper training.”

“True,” Keitarou’s eyes were wary, “but your praise obviously comes with a catch. If you think you can sweet-talk me and take me by surprise...”

“No, I don’t think that,” Shunsui shook his head. “I don’t underestimate you as an opponent, Keitarou. The people you’ve killed, all of them have underestimated you. Even Juushirou did, at first, and it almost cost him dear. I’m not that naive. I know that, even if you’re stalling for time, the first chance you get to kill me, you’ll take. But you haven’t released your Bankai on me, which makes me think you know it won’t work. Perhaps that’s something your spy told you — or maybe it was your prophet, seeing pictures that hadn’t yet come to be. I don’t know... I don’t have those sources at my disposal, so I’m only guessing. What I do know is that, if you really thought you could make a puppet of me, you’d have done it by now. Your stalling for time indicates that you’re not sure what will happen if you use it... your use of your shikai tells me you don’t want to take that risk. Maybe, too, you’re hoping someone will come to find out what’s going on here, and you can use them to fight me instead of facing me yourself.”

“Say you’re right,” Keitarou said slowly. “Say there’s even a grain of truth in what you’re telling me — so?”

“So for me, the hardest kind of opponent to fight is one who avoids engaging directly,” Shunsui admitted. “And, as I’ve learned from your sword attack, so you’ve probably learned from mine. I doubt that I could use my shadow technique to hurt you now, because I’ve done it once before. You’ve taken precautions against it. Even Bushougoma... now you’ve seen it, almost certainly you’d be ready for it the next time. I can keep throwing my attacks at you, but you will just learn how to evade them until Nagesu-sama returns. This is a stalemate that suits neither one of us.”

“If time passes and my cousin returns, it suits me fine,” Keitarou pointed out, and Shunsui shook his head.

“You forget, I have your son,” he warned, and Keitarou sighed, looking irritated.

“If you even think you can kill Koku...” he began, but Shunsui held up his hand to cut his opponent off.

“I’m not going to debate with you, since we both know I can,” he said softly. “I’m offering you fair terms, which you ought to pay attention to. I’m inviting you to play a game with me. Winner takes all.”

“A game?” Keitarou’s fingers were already glittering with Kidou light, as though preparing to put a barrier around his body, but Shunsui nodded, offering him a nonchalant smile.

“My sword isn’t all about shadows and light. It’s a part of it, but not all of it,” he replied. “I think you realise that, though — I’d be surprised if you hadn’t. Katen Kyoukotsu’s true nature is to make a game out of life and death. The games my sword initiates are won and lost on strategic thinking, as much as spiritual skill. My sword is unforgiving, Keitarou, and it doesn’t show me any bias. If a game begins, it only ends when someone is dead. That person can be me, if you can figure out the rules of the game and utilise them more quickly than I can.”

“You might be lying to me,” Keitarou pointed out, and Shunsui nodded.

“I might,” he agreed matter-of-factly. “But you have to remember that now, I know your shikai, and I can defend against it. I know your Bankai, and am, probably, not susceptible to it. You’re running out of options and your son’s life is at stake. You wanted a fair fight... this is the only way you’re likely to get it. It’s a gamble, trusting me. It’s a gamble, agreeing to my terms. But can you afford to take any other chances? This is probably the only opportunity you have to kill me — if you think your intelligence is up to it.”

“You’re baiting me, now,” Keitarou looked weary, but he nodded his head. “I see your logic, however. You’re right... I don’t want to use my Bankai here, not on you, not when I might have to use it somewhere else. I don’t know what would happen, but Chudokuga has made it very clear to me that trying it would be a big mistake. I don’t usually gamble on other people’s terms, but this entire battle is a gamble on my part. My son’s life is also not disposable. I’ll play your game, Kyouraku Shunsui. You are smart, but you are not smarter than me.”

“Probably not,” Shunsui acknowledged, lifting Amaki’s blade and bringing it down between them in a smooth curve. “But once the game begins, the only way out is when somebody dies. You’re bound by the rules of the game, and so am I. There’s no cheating. No ducking and diving. We’re on equal terms, Keitarou. From this point until one of us is defeated. Irooni.”

As he spoke the last word, Amaki and Seibara’s blades glimmered faintly with an ominous light, and Shunsui knew that his swords had accepted the challenge. A lump surfaced in his throat, and he swallowed hard, hoping that Keitarou could not see the apprehension that coursed through his veins.

He had never used this technique before in battle. He had trained with it, long and hard, and he understood it in theory, but in practice, it had never been practicable. This was a gamble for Keitarou, but it was also a gamble for him... trying to outsmart a genius with his own life firmly on the line.

I promised Koku.

He frowned, hardening his resolve.

I promised Koku I’d put an end to it. I promised him I’d make sure of everything he asked. He’s followed through on his side. Now I need to follow through on mine, otherwise... it doesn’t bear thinking about. Whatever the costs of this fight, I can’t let Keitarou leave here alive.

“Irooni?” Keitarou echoed the game’s name, looking derisive. “Colour demon? Is that the game?”

“It is,” Shunsui rallied himself, offering his companion a sweet smile. “I’m generous, and I’ll let you go first. You swing at me, and name a colour. That’s all it is. Simple, don’t you think?”

“Name a colour?” Keitarou’s brows knitted together. “And you won’t take a pot shot at me while I do?”

“It’s a chance you take,” Shunsui shrugged, “but it all depends on the game. I could try to cut off your head, but if it’s not the right colour, you wouldn’t even be scratched. I told you. We’re bound by the rules of the game, now. There’s no cheating Katen Kyoukotsu. Your turn. Play.”

Keitarou’s eyes had widened at this explanation, and then he pursed his lips, a look of comprehension flooding his features.

“I see,” he murmured. “The colour is the weapon, not the blade. Whatever sword I hold, or however many you have, the colour is what does the damage. That's why you say it's strategy... very well. In which case, I choose the colour, white."

He slashed his blade down towards his opponent, who hopped back, tut-tutting.

"Wrong answer," he murmured, spreading his weapons to reveal his unharmed body, the edge of his haori nicked by the edge of Keitarou's blade, but not enough to draw any blood. "White is a good colour, sometimes, but it isn't the right colour for you to defeat me. My turn now, Keitarou. Grey,"

He darted forward, swinging Seibara's point aggressively up towards Keitarou's body, and despite himself, the scientist flinched, attempting to pull out of the way. His attempt was too slow, for Shunsui pushed into shunpo, his blade raking across the entirety of Keitarou's upper body. The scientist let out a gasp, then his expression became one of shock and disbelief, for although the weapon should have penetrated deep into the bone, shattering his shoulderblades and piercing into his lungs, there was not the slightest sign of a wound. Instead, the sharp weapon sliced away the fabric of Keitarou's old grey cloak, causing it to flap and hang helplessly against his body. Shunsui was still in range, and Keitarou drove his own weapon up, hoping to catch his companion on the break, but Chudokuga's malformed blade glanced harmlessly off Shunsui's haori-covered shoulder, leaving not even the slightest of impressions. The next moment the opportunity was gone, for Shunsui retreated back into shunpo, re-materialising atop a broken section of Senkaimon.

"You see, it's not such an easy game to play," he observed lightly. "I can cut you in half at close range, but if Katen Kyoukotsu doesn't like it, it won't win me the game. Your play, Keitarou. It's your colour. You call."

Keitarou's eyes narrowed, and he reached up with his free left hand, pulling away the remains of his damaged cloak and tossing it onto the ground. Shunsui's eyes darted to it briefly, his heart leaping in his chest, but he said nothing, merely waiting for his opponent to reason out his next move. Everything now depended on Keitarou's judgement. He had taken a risk, but it had been a risk he needed to take. Still, his pulse echoed in his ears, for he knew that, in a matter of moments, he could kill or be killed.

"If you have time to rearrange your clothing, let me have a moment to put my haori back together," he called, injecting false levity into his tone. "Like this it'll catch against my sword arm when I try to move — and now you've seen that the game doesn't allow me any special favours, it's not as though I can take a shot at you while your guard is down."

"Clansfolk," Keitarou snorted, but he acknowledged the request with a flick of his hand. "Do what you like. You're the one who said you were in a hurry. The longer this game goes on, the better for me." Except that, if we're still playing this game by the time they return, there's a good chance you can't break it and go after them with your Bankai, because that'll be breaking the rules.

Shunsui's eyes narrowed to slits at this, sliding Amaki's blade beneath his left arm and using his right to pull the flaps of his haori closed over the uniform beneath. It was a calculated risk, for he felt certain that the next round would be decisive, and he would have only one chance to play his wildcard. Smoothing down the jagged edge of the fabric, he glanced briefly at his body, noticing how much of the black shihakushou now showed through. With relief, he realised that it was almost completely covered by the fall of the white cloth, and he thanked his lucky stars that Tokutarou had selected a haori design with long sleeves, not with short, when he had been preparing for the opening of Eighth Division.

That decision may just save my life, Oniisama. And more, maybe the whole of Seireitei. I'll have to buy you some special sake... if I live to see the end of this fight.

"All right, I'm done," he said now, taking Amaki back in his right hand and folding his arms across his chest so that the haori remained closed. "Your move. Go."

"You said that this was about strategy, not about physical attack, didn't you?" Keitarou glanced at his weapon, then thoughtfully back at Shunsui. "I called white, but it failed. You called grey, but it failed. All we did was damage each other's clothing. So those aren't the right answer... and I think I know why. Only, if I'm right about this, there's a considerable amount of risk on both sides. There's only one colour that we're both wearing in quantity, Shunsui-dono... which makes me think that that's the colour which wins the game."

"Maybe you're right," Shunsui's heart skipped another beat, but somehow he kept his voice level. "Talking about it won't test the theory, though. Acting on it will."

"Fine," Keitarou clicked his tongue against his teeth. "That's what I'll do, if you're so keen to die. Black."

He launched forward, driving his sword towards Shunsui's upper body, and instinctively Shunsui tensed, raising his weapons although he knew that he could not defend against the swing that way. Hunching his arms together, he said a silent prayer that his gamble had paid off, and that he had not miscalculated the true nature of his sword's game.

There was a sharp sensation, as Chudokuga buried itself in his body, and Shunsui closed his eyes, but there was no immediate burning pain, and he heard a curse, as Keitarou drew back, clearly discomfited. He opened one eye, seeing the scientist glancing at the clean blade of the sword in obvious bewilderment, and he drew a breath into his lungs, trying to settle himself. The time had come, and he could not falter. He had played the game by the right rules and he could win... but only if he was able to make the final, decisive move.

"My turn," he said softly, raising Seibara and flinging it across the courtyard, in the opposite direction of his companion's body. Keitarou started, staring at the discarded blade, then back at Shunsui with a rising sense of disbelief.

"Why would you lose a sword at this point in the game?" he demanded. "Why didn't my sword cut you, when you said that there were fixed rules? Black is the only colour we're both wearing. I'm sure I'm not wrong... so why didn't I cut you? You said this was a fair game... if you lied to me..."

"I didn't lie," Shunsui slid his left arm through the sleeve of his haori, tossing Amaki's blade into his left hand before repeating the exercise on the right. The haori fluttered harmlessly to the ground behind him, revealing him in his full shinigami shihakushou, and at the sight of it, Keitarou's eyes widened in sudden dismay. His fingers glittered, as though to release a spell of rejection, but it was too late, for Shunsui was already upon him, Amaki's sword raised with its point upwards, ready to kill.

"Black is the right colour," he said softly, "Your guess was right, only your strategy was wrong."

Amaki's blade made contact with Keitarou's torso at this point, slicing through the flesh and bone. The force of the swing sent the scientist flying across the cobbles, landing with a sickening crack on his back against the base of the old Senkaimon, and Shunsui shook the excess blood free from his weapon, advancing on his victim with a sense of resignation.

"You understood my game quickly," he said quietly. "You read it right, and you understood what to do. Only the one thing you didn't realise is that the game changes depending on what you wear. If you had still worn your cloak, I would not have wounded you as deeply as I know I have. That's why I called grey. I knew it couldn't hurt you, but it could damage your cloak and make you discard it, making your dominant colour, black. And, if I had not been wearing my haori, you would've killed me outright with your last swing. I covered my body with it so that, as far as the game was concerned, I was white. Your attack failed, because it couldn't cut through to the black and my body beneath. When I removed my haori, I became black, too. The greatest damage is inflicted on a colour which puts you at the greatest risk. You were right, you just didn't see all of the parameters of managing that risk. Like I said, Irooni is a game of strategy, not of strength, but the strategy begins from the very first round. You lost the game, Keitarou... and so, your life."

"I should... have known... that a man... with your... licentious... reputation... would have... a skill... that relies... on striptease," Keitarou's words were gasped out, and Shunsui knew that he had perforated a lung. He nodded.

"They say our swords reflect our nature," he agreed evenly. "I'm sorry for it, though. I take no pleasure from doing this, no matter how much I hate you. Unlike you, I'm not happy about taking life."

"That... makes you... the fool," Keitarou coughed, blood dribbling from the corner of his mouth, and Shunsui's grip on his blade tightened as he debated whether or not to put the man out of his misery once and for all. "I knew... one day... if I didn't kill you... you would kill me. I knew... but still... when the prize... is big... the gambles... are all... worthwhile."

"Even if you lose everything on one game?" Shunsui asked, and Keitarou snorted.

"I haven't," he whispered hoarsely. "I've seen the future... Shunsui-dono. Even if I don't... see it with... my eyes... I have... seen it... all. Even if I die... it doesn't... stop with... me."

"And if I kill Koku, then it stops?" Shunsui demanded. Keitarou coughed again, shaking his head.

"You can't... stop it," he taunted. "It's... already too late. The... seeds are... sown. If not... this battle... then... a later... war. Maybe... if I'm lucky... I'll see it then... when I come... to be reborn. The future... is in... my blood... and... its also... in yours."

"What the hell are you talking about?" Shunsui was unnerved now, but Keitarou merely offered him a smile. Lifting a shaking right hand, he grasped hold of Amaki's blade, then, with a quick, decisive thrust, he pulled the sharp edge of the weapon down, slicing through his throat. Blood spurted from the wound, and, as the scientist's eyes glazed over, Shunsui shook his weapon free from the pale grasp, gazing down at the corpse with mixed emotions.

The future is in your blood and in mine. What does that mean? What has he seen? Something in that young lad of Juushirou's? Is he our enemy, after all? Have I killed the father only to make room for the son to come and take his place?

He set Amaki down on the ground, kneeling at Keitarou's side to close the man's eyes with the edge of his hand. Now the pressure of the confrontation was off, he felt nauseated, spots dancing before his eyes at the true graphic nature of his opponent's injuries, but he held the feeling in check. Instead he moved to loosen Chudokuga from Keitarou's failing grip, noting how the surface had dulled as Keitarou's reiryoku had slipped out of it. The edge of the blade had already taken on a brittle appearance, and he laid it gently across his victim's bloody chest.

A dead man's sword should die with him, and even an evil man and an evil sword deserve that.

He let out a heavy sigh, retrieving his right blade and getting reluctantly to his feet, walking across to where Seibara was lodged between two round cobblestones. Going to pick it up, he hesitated, then raised Amaki's blade instead, thrusting it into the ground alongside its sister. Ignoring the protests of his zanpakutou at this rough treatment, he turned his back on the weapon that had helped sever Keitarou's life, instead crossing the ground to where his discarded haori still lay in the dust. Picking it up from the ground, he cast it a pensive glance, fingering the sliced fabric where Chudokuga's blade had cut through. He did not attempt to put it back on, instead draping it over the remains of the Senkaimon as he reconsidered the conversation he had had with Kohaku.

"My father wants to kill everyone in Seireitei, and he has a strategy that will succeed in doing it," the young boy had said, his voice shaking and his eyes intense and full of emotion. "He knew the Gotei would never send all its troops to one location and leave Seireitei vulnerable, so he took advantage of that fact. He split your forces so that he could launch his attack in waves. He'll create confusion by attacking Inner Seireitei, then, when the other Captains return, he'll use Chudokuga to turn them into his weapons. Ukitake-dono won't be killed in the first attack, but the second wave... that's when it will all become worse. Father has no grudge against District shinigami, but he can't control Ukitake-dono, so he'll want to kill him and I know that the people in Thirteenth wouldn't just deliver their Captain and stand by and watch that happen. Because of that, in the second wave of attack, Thirteenth will be decimated to a man by one of Father's puppet Captains. The other puppets will rip apart the other Divisions, including your own, and everyone they find will be slain. I can't promise allies of yours won't be killed, Kyouraku-dono, even if you work with me to prevent that kind of massacre. I know there will be lives lost and there's nothing I can do to prevent it. But if you don't want everyone you care about to be dead, then you have to kill my father before he can release Chudokuga a second time."

"And you're all right with me killing your father?" Shunsui had demanded, and Kohaku had drawn a shaky breath into his lungs, meeting his companion's gaze with a look of genuine anguish.

"I love my father very much," he had whispered. "I love him, and every word I speak now is treason against him — something a son should never do to a father. I'm a terrible person, Kyouraku-dono, and I don't expect you to believe me or to trust a man who can betray his own father — but I don't want to see innocent people die. It doesn't just end with those here in Inner Seireitei. Death is never an isolated event, it always has a knock on effect on something or someone. If the shinigami here are killed, then there's nobody to protect the Districts. Nobody to kill Hollows. Nobody to govern. There'll be chaos. Famine. Huge swathes of suffering that can be prevented. Children starving, mothers dying of disease, fathers fighting over every scrap of food to feed their family. Nobody will ever go and rescue the souls in Rukongai. The balance of the world will fall apart, and it will be the end. My Father believes he can change the world, but he doesn't realise that he will destroy it first. I can't let anyone else die, not if their lives can be protected. And I don't want to see Ukitake-dono killed because he's believed in me all this time. The new world Father believes in creating... is a world only people like Ukitake-dono can create."

"And I'm the only one who can kill Keitarou? Nobody else?"

"Only you," Kohaku had confirmed sadly. "Nobody else. If you're killed, Kyouraku-dono, then it's all over. I'm not just going to sit back and let things happen. I know Father will go to the Gate at Third Division to wait for the returning Gotei members, and if I can, I'll destroy the Gate. I'll break his hold over as many people as I'm able, but I don't know how much strength I will have, or if Gotei shinigami will stop me. I can't do anything until Father brings me my sword, but I'm not fully recovered from my injury and even with that, I might not be able to make a huge difference. It might be you will have to kill friends who can't be saved, and I'm sorry for that. Just... what I made you see..is a fragment of the reality. I wish I could make you see more, but I can't. What I've given you will have to do."

"If Keitarou dies, that reality goes away?"

"If Father is stopped, then yes, there will be peace," Kohaku's expression had been troubled, but he had nodded. "If I live through it, perhaps, there will be peace for longer. I'm not sure about it, Kyouraku-dono. Kyouka won't let me see all the things I want to see, and I don't even know if I should see them, anyway. But I think... so long as Father is stopped... then this time, the war will be over."

Shunsui gazed up now at the damaged Senkaimon, perching on the edge of a piece of damaged rubble as he watched his dusty, blood-specked haori flutter in the breeze, and inside him, a sense of conviction began to take form..

I'm going to trust your word, kid. I hope that you did live through this, so that I can ask you the things your Father didn't want to tell me. Maybe from you, I'll get the full truth...

He glanced at the corpse again, a heavy feeling in his heart.
Although maybe, on balance, it's better not to know what the future holds.

"Otousama!"

Across the other side of Soul Society, in the small, makeshift sickroom, Kohaku's eyes suddenly snapped open, the word passing his lips almost before he had known he was going to speak. Though he was back at Thirteenth Division, all that filled his vision was the final image of his father, lying broken and bloody on the cobbles of the Third, and his heart spasmed in his chest, stifling his lungs and making it hard for him to breathe. The thrusts and flows of reiryoku in the atmosphere made the air thick and cloying, and he struggled to pull himself into a sitting position, fighting against some invisible force that seemed to weigh heavily on his upper body.

"Koku-kun?"

The voice came from the shadows, startling him out of his dream-state, and he jerked his head up, his eyes wild and frightened as for a moment he could not place the speaker. The next minute, a figure emerged from the shadows of the chamber, and Kohaku's heart steadied briefly as he recognised the Thirteenth Division Captain, his lank white hair loose for once over his shoulders. At the sight of the white haori, though, Kohaku's breathing choked in his throat once more. An image of Shunsui's haori, fluttering to the ground like a flag of surrender overwhelmed him, and he gripped at the blankets as the gleaming weapon of Amaki's blade headed straight towards him.

"Koku, it's all right."

Juushirou was beside him now, a reassuring arm on his shoulder, and a soft, soothing voice resonating through the levels of fear and delusion to the raw self beneath. He wasn't at Third Division, he realised dully. He wasn't Keitarou, facing the point of Shunsui's sword, but instead, he was Kohaku, and, somehow, he had made it back from the broken Senkaimon, though for the life of him he did not know how. As rationality began to return to him in fits and starts, a great swell of emotion surged up from deep within his body, and he closed his eyes, turning his head away so that Juushirou could not see his face. Tears glittered against his lashes, but he fought fiercely against letting them fall. A son who betrayed his father had no right to cry at his passing, he told himself bitterly, but despite his best attempts, he could not push the feelings aside.

He had not been there to see it, but he had known it all the same. Every flicker of reiryoku in the air was like a beacon announcing Keitarou's death, and, as Juushirou gently turned him around so that he could not hide, he opened his eyes, seeing the same understanding in the grave hazel eyes of his companion.

"I'm sorry, Koku-kun," he said softly, and there was no need for him to say what he was apologising for. As he had felt his father's reiryoku dispersing in defeat, Juushirou had recognised the spike of Katen Kyoukotsu and had understood what it had meant.

He swallowed hard, his breathing hampered and uneven.

"It's my fault," he whispered. "I'm an evil person, Ukitake-dono. You shouldn't have helped me. You should've left me to die. You shouldn't have brought me back here. I don't belong here."

"Of course it's not..." Juushirou began, but Kohaku shook his head.

"It is," he cut across his companion. "Father's dead, and it's my fault. I made it happen. I killed my father. You should kill me. I can't be forgiven. Father is dead... I can't be forgiven."

His voice rose slightly, as his emotions threatened to wash him away on a wave of hysteria, but Juushirou had seen the danger, and he gave the young man a gentle shake.

"You did nothing," he said firmly. "You have been here, with us. I know you felt what happened, and it's upset you — but Koku, it's not your fault. Magaki Shizuka from the Eighth found you passed out in the street, and we brought you back here. That's what happened. I swear."

"You don't understand," Kohaku raised plaintive eyes to his protector. "I told Kyouraku-dono... I asked him. I asked him to... to stop... to stop Father. I told him... I saw what happened, and I told him... so that he... could make it true."

Shock and dismay filled Juushirou's expression, and Kohaku lowered his gaze, ashamed.

"I told you, I shouldn't be forgiven," he murmured. "It's not Kyouraku-dono's fault. I made him do it. I told him that if he didn't, you would be killed. I knew he'd act, then. But I didn't want... anyone else to die."

"You're not making any sense," Juushirou settled himself more comfortably at Kohaku's side, and the stray let out a shuddering sigh.

"I saw it, a long time ago," he murmured. "It was why I was born... to stop this from happening. I'd run away, so many times. I could've... but I didn't. I loved my father. I didn't want to betray him, but the longer I didn't, the more people he killed. People I killed, because I didn't stop him. Kyouka said so. He said... that it was my fault."

"Kyouka?" Juushirou asked gently, and Kohaku nodded, his gaze suddenly drawn to the pulsing, glittering weapon that lay on the shelf near the bed.

"Kyouka Raigen," he whispered, and Juushirou's lips thinned.

"That's the name of the sword?" he pressed, and Kohaku nodded again.

"At the Senkaimon, he told me," he said vaguely. "There's a castle and he's a mirror, and it was covered in dust... and he said that if I didn't act, and take control of the things I could control, I'd never be able to protect anything. He said that I had to make a decision, so I did. I wanted to prevent more people dying, so I did... what I had to do. I didn't want you to die either, Ukitake-dono. Kyouraku-dono promised that he'd help. He listened to me, and he believed me. Now it's... its over. Just like I asked him to do it, it happened just as I saw. Even though I didn't tell him how... it still happened in the way I knew it would. But now I've killed my father. Like Father made puppets, Ukitake-dono, I made Kyouraku-dono want to kill Father. I made him afraid. I showed him you were dead, and so he did it..."

"But I'm not dead," Juushirou was nonplussed. "I'm not dead, and Koku, I'm sure Shunsui knows that."

“Yes, but if he hadn’t...” Kohaku drew another shaking breath into his lungs, knowing he wasn’t making sense but unable to put the pieces together in a way that would make himself properly understood. “If your friends had come back, everyone would have died. I had to break the Gate, but then... I couldn’t stop Father. And so...”

“Let me get this straight,” Juushirou frowned. “You asked Shunsui to kill Keitarou, because if he didn’t, Keitarou would do something that would’ve resulted in the deaths of a lot more people? People here at Thirteenth, and elsewhere?”

Kohaku sniffled, nodding his head dolefully, and Juushirou bit his lip.

“You chose us over Keitarou’s life?” he asked, clear distress in his tones, and again, Kohaku nodded.

“I wanted to stop people dying,” he murmured. “I didn’t want my father to die, Ukitake-dono, but I knew... there was no way back. Not this time. It was either him. Or. Everything. And... I... couldn’t let him kill you. I knew... when he came for me... that he would kill you, if I didn’t act. I thought it, but then, I knew it. I wasn’t going to let him kill you, Ukitake-dono, only now I made your friend a murderer and I betrayed my own father and I’m a terrible person who deserves to die!”

With that the tears overwhelmed him, and he buried his head in Juushirou’s shoulder, shaking with the force of his sobs. Momentarily taken aback, Juushirou hugged him tightly, and something in the Captain’s soothing grip reassured the stricken youth. Though he had said terrible things, and done terrible things, there was no judgement or censure in Juushirou’s aura, and Kohaku clung to this fact, afraid to let go of this one anchor in his sea of fear and guilt.

“It will be all right,” At length Juushirou spoke, and Kohaku felt someone pat him on the head. “I’m sorry it happened this way, but Koku, the one to blame isn’t you. You might have seen the future, but you can’t control the actions of people. Your father chose to come here. He chose to hurt my comrades, and take their lives. Shunsui chose to stop him. It wasn’t your fault.”

“But I told him to...” Kohaku’s voice was muffled by the fabric of the haori, and Juushirou sighed.

“Maybe you did,” he agreed cautiously, “but you have to know that, a long time ago, someone else told Shunsui that, one day, he might have to take your father’s life. Long, long before you were born, a man who was Sensei to both of us told Shunsui that he had the kind of sword that might be able to stop Keitarou from causing more pain. Today, he lived up to that expectation. It was his choice, and it was your father's. It wasn't yours. Whatever you saw, whatever you said, this wasn't your fault. Really. It wasn't your fault."

"Why are you still so nice to me, when I made your friend do something so horrible?" Kohaku raised confused brown eyes to his companion, Juushirou's face fuzzy and blurred through the tears. "I don't understand. I don't understand."

"Because I believe in you," Juushirou said simply. "And I gave my word. You're safe here. That's a promise. Mitsuki's gone to get some herbs so she can make you something to help you recover your strength, and when you've had a chance to rest, we'll talk about it all properly. I promise, we will. Right now, though, you've had a shock... and you need to rest."

"I can't... I need to... the Gate at Twelfth..." Kohaku struggled feebly against Juushirou's hold, as shreds of memory resurfaced, but Juushirou shook his head.

"Koku, today you raised your zanpakutou," he said gently. "Whether you meant to or not, you did. The toll that takes on a person's body varies, but you need to recover from it, and rest. Whatever happened to the Senkaimon, I'm sure we'll work it out, but later. Not right now."

"Juushirou, I handed Magaki-san over to Hikifune-san, and she's helping with... Koku? You're awake?"

The door of the chamber slid back to reveal Mitsuki, a bundle of different medical supplies in her arms, and at the sight of her, Kohaku flinched, burying his head once more in Juushirou's haori.

"It's all right, Mitsuki. Come in," he heard Juushirou's voice, then the sound of footsteps. "He's upset, poor kid. I'm sure you realise what's happened, and he knows it too. I think, perhaps, he saw it — and he's rattled as well as exhausted. If you've something he can take, just to help him rest..."

"I have to get to the Gate!" Kohaku struggled again at this, but as he met the kind concern in Juushirou's eyes, he faltered, fresh tears filling his eyes.

"I'm sorry," he murmured, and Juushirou shook his head.

"Making sure you're all right is part of my job, and it's all of Mitsuki's right now," he said gently. "You trust us, don't you? We wouldn't do anything to hurt you, and you're safe here. Let Mitsuki help you sleep. She'll take the nightmares away, and you'll be able to rest. Then, later, we'll talk. Later... but not now. All right?"

Something in Juushirou's tone killed the last of Kohaku's fight, and he nodded meekly, allowing his companion to set him back against his pillows as Mitsuki carefully mixed the right herbs together to create a sleeping draught. Carefully she put it to his lips, and, at Juushirou's reassuring nod, Kohaku drank, allowing the bitter mixture to run over his tongue and down the back of his throat. Though the medicine could not erase the reality of what had happened, little by little he felt his senses dulling, and, as Mitsuki set the cup aside, he closed his eyes, feeling her pull the blankets up to cover his chest.

"He's had a hard day," faintly he heard her words, genuine concern in her tones. "I'm glad we got him back here, Juushirou. I don't like to think what would've happened if we hadn't."

"Me either, but we've a lot to consider when he wakes," That was Juushirou's response, but it was the last thing Kohaku heard as he sank into comforting, oblivious black.

71. Reflection

Chapter Sixty Nine : Reflection

“That reiatsu was definitely Katen Kyoukotsu.”

As Hirata and Hakubei reached the corner of the junction between Fifth and Fourth Division, Hirata reached out a sudden hand to grab his companion, pulling him back against the wall that separated the two divisions, an anxious look on his face. “Something’s happening up ahead. Third Division, unless I miss my guess. Something involving Shunsui... and a release like that.”

“You think he’s found what we’re looking for?” Hakubei cast his companion a quizzical glance, and Hirata nodded his head. “In that case, why aren’t we heading to his aid? If Keitarou’s at Third Division, and we’re the closest back up... why did you pull me aside like that? You almost yanked me clean over — I had no idea you had so much strength in those skinny arms of yours.”

“I am a Clan leader, Hakubei-dono, even if I’m your sister’s schoolmate and effectively a kouhai in terms of Captaincy,” Hirata removed his glasses, rubbing them on the sleeve of his haori absently as he closed his eyes, allowing the currents of air rippling around them to translate themselves into a clearer picture of the situation. “As for why we’re stopping here, even Endou have common sense and a modicum of survival instinct.”

“Are you afraid of Keitarou?” Hakubei was startled, and Hirata’s eyes snapped open, the glitter of indignation that momentarily crossed the pale gaze the only hint to the hunter that still lurked beneath. He shook his head, returning the spectacles to their place atop his nose.

“I hate him,” he said softly. “More than you can probably understand, Hakubei-dono. You’re a Shiba, and Shiba aren’t capable of hating on that level. You’re lucky it’s that way. Keitarou murdered my grandfather, abducted my sister and ruined her, and through that union was born the assassin who killed my son. No, I’m not afraid of him. As I am now, if I had the chance, I’d blast him cell from cell and limb from limb.”

“Woah there,” Hakubei put his hands up hastily, as the air currents surrounding them suddenly began to whip up speed. “I don’t need to see the Wind Hawk, so take it as my ignorant mistake. I’m damn scared of the man, considering what he did to Kanshi and I without us even meeting him, so don't take it as a slight. I have no clue how he got us, or when he did... and that's pretty darn scary, even when you're a grown man with a haori and a sword. So being scared, I understand. What I don't understand is why you don't want to advance any further. We were looking for Keitarou, and we both think Shunsui found him. We should go offer back up — three heads are better than one, and this isn't a villain for whom fair fight holds any meaning."

"No, not yet," Hirata shook his head, grasping hold of Hakubei's arm a little tighter this time, his nails digging into the man's arm through the fabric of his uniform. "I said we wait, so we wait. I might be younger than you, but if I have to call Clan and Council rank on this I will, Hakubei-dono. We're not getting involved in this fight."

"Ow! Ow, ow, let go!" Hakubei wrenched his arm free, rubbing it ruefully. "All right, I get the message. We can hold back if you want, but at least explain why we are. If this is the man you hate all that much, why don't you want to go in there and kill him? If that's not why we left Ninth — and after seeing Anabomi, I think killing Keitarou the logical thing we should be doing — then what?"

"It's not Keitarou that bothers me," Hirata shook his head, his gaze flitting back in the direction of Third. "It's Shunsui. Hakubei-dono, have you ever seen Katen Kyoukotsu in release?"

"No, not in combat," Hakubei shook his head. "I think he showed it off once, because of the novelty of his paired blades, but I've never seen Shunsui actually fight. Well, sealed, maybe — but there's never really been a time when..."

He faltered, as a sudden flare of energy ripped through the surroundings, and Hirata's lips set into a grim line. He nodded.

"There are two reasons I won't cross into this fight," he murmured. "Number one is that, if I did, and I killed Keitarou, there'd be nothing left of him. I'm too angry at him to hold back and deal with it rationally like I did with Anabomi, and I wouldn't trust myself not to disperse his body into fragments on the wind. Seireitei need a corpse, though, to prove he's dead. They need that evidence."

"And the second?" The breeze had calmed, but Hakubei was still eying his companion warily, and Hirata offered him a rueful glance.

"I'm not a match for Katen Kyoukotsu," he admitted. "I don't want to put myself in a position where I might be in danger of fallout from it."

“Shunsui wouldn’t hurt you,” Hakubei objected, and Hirata shrugged.

“No, not on purpose,” he agreed cautiously, “but Katen Kyoukotsu is a tricky sword. I mean that literally. If you get caught up in one of its games, it’s difficult to know where it might end.”

He sighed, dropping back against the wall in resignation.

“It ought to have been me,” he said regretfully. “I have the motive, the hatred, and I’m an Endou. Killing Keitarou might calm something in me, and it certainly wouldn’t upset me. I’ve spent more than twenty years regretting my hesitation, the one moment I had that chance... but that was my chance, and I wasted it.”

“Are you sure?” Hakubei’s brows knitted together, glancing in the direction of the Third. “I’ve known Shunsui a long time, longer than you, in fact. He’s not one to let people past the facade and the smile if he can help it, but he’s also never struck me as someone primed for killing. Can he kill Keitarou? Even if he dislikes him, even understanding what Keitarou is... do you think he can?”

“It doesn’t matter if he can or not,” Hirata said matter-of-factly. “Katen Kyoukotsu can. That’s all that matters.”

“I don’t understand,” Hakubei looked flummoxed, and Hirata offered him a hollow smile.

“Pray you don’t need to,” was all he vouchsafed, however, and at that moment there was a sudden flicker of spiritual energy, followed by a sinking, deathly lull. Even the breeze seemed to stop still, and Hirata’s lips thinned as he interpreted what it meant.

“It’s over,” he said softly. “Come on. We ought to go, now.”

“Now?” Hakubei began, but Hirata wasn’t listening, already slipping into shunpo as he hurried through the streams of light towards the Third Division and his friend’s unmistakable location. As he exited the flash-step, he drew breath sharply at the scene that greeted him.

The cobbles were littered with debris; charred wood, twisted metal and the folorn remains of a grey cloak, flapping gently against the stone. Not far away, two familiar swords were embedded deep into the earth. They had not been sealed, and the tassels that adorned the hilts of both hung limply down against the silver blades. One of the weapons was smeared with blood, and Hirata almost thought the way the tassel fell was attempting to cover the stain, trying to conceal the shame of what it had done.

Something black and bloody lay not too far away, and Hirata's gaze followed the seeping stains across the limp form, his gaze moving from legs, to torso, and ultimately, to the head. Without hesitation he strode over towards it, standing over the body of his self-proclaimed brother in law and gazing down at him impassively. He had had his chest clawed open by the sharp edge of Shunsui's blade, he realised, assessing the wounds in clinical, distant fashion. The weapon had punctured the left lung and grazed the heart, but it was the congealing mass of red that covered the scientist's throat that had struck the final death blow. Keitarou's eyes were closed, but, despite the gore and the blood that stained his lips, his expression was more one of smug contentment than of horror or anger. This fact twisted up inside the Endou leader like a corkscrew.

In death you are mocking me, telling me that I never did get you, and that, even if I had, it wouldn't change all the things that have happened since last we met. It wouldn't mean Eiraki wasn't a murderer, and it wouldn't bring Souja back. You stole my sister and my son from me, and now I can't make you answer to me for either one. No wonder you're smug now, Keitarou — taking to your grave the last laugh over my Clan. I would've made you suffer for it — but yet again, you've escaped me.

In the middle of the courtyard was the remains of the Senkaimon's frame and constructed gateway, the severely blackened stumps of wood and metal telling Hirata that something of considerable force had ripped the device apart with little consideration for its delicate functions. Beyond, the atmospheric access point allowing travel in and out of the Dangai was no more than a flickering blip of energy, the waves of spiritual energy upsetting the connection so badly that even had Nagesu himself been present, Hirata felt certain that it would have been impossible to open. A dusty, torn, blood-stained haori was draped over part of the damaged construction and, on a heap of rubble alongside it, Hirata made out the shihakushou-clad figure of his own close friend.

Shunsui had noticed his arrival, of that he was sure, but the older man had not made any attempt to acknowledge it. His eyes were distant, his brow creased and his lips pressed together, as though contemplating something that Hirata knew he would probably never put into words. His skin was pale, whiter than Hirata had ever seen it before, but there was blood and ash staining his fingers and, though the impression was very slight indeed, Hirata was sure that Shunsui's hands were trembling.

Hirata's gaze flitted to Keitarou's body once more, fresh hatred brewing in his heart.

Yes, and you made this man kill you, instead of me. You knew that, if I killed you, I'd walk away without a single emotional scar. Shunsui's different from me, though. He'll never be able to forget about you because of this... which is probably what you wanted. Scar the heart of the man forced to bring you down... I wouldn't put it past you to do that, as a final, spiteful blow.

Out loud he said,

“Shunsui?”

“Hirata,” Now Shunsui acknowledged him, raising his head to meet his friend’s questioning gaze, and a faint, odd smile touched his lips. “Well, I suppose it’s a good thing it’s you, and not Nagesu-sama. The mess here will be hard to explain.”

“It’s done, though,” Hirata moved towards the Senkaimon, stepping carefully over broken pieces of the structure. “It had to be — we both know that. Regardless of the structural damage — this needed to be done.”

“Are you cross with me?” Shunsui asked quizzically, and Hirata frowned.

“Cross?” he asked, and Shunsui nodded.

“For taking away your prey,” he explained, and Hirata sighed, shrugging his shoulders.

“It would’ve been better for both you and I if I had, but I probably wouldn’t have left such an identifiable corpse,” he admitted. “It’s all right, I’m not cross. Not with you. With him — probably always — but not enough to take after my mad uncle and start carving up his body. He’s dead and its done... you don’t need to stay here like this. We’ll move the body inside and find someone to keep watch over it, but your Division are worried about you, and there’s a lot of other things to be done.”

“Like putting back together the pieces of Anabomi?” Shunsui sent Hirata an opaque glance, and Hirata pulled a face.

“You felt that too, huh?”

“Hard to miss, living next door. I didn’t leave Eighth till after your skirmish was about done. I know you killed him, Hirata. I’m going to trust that your reason was more than just anger.”

“He was turned Hollow, more or less,” Hirata said frankly, and Shunsui’s eyes narrowed to slits as he digested this. “I don’t know why or how, not exactly, but I have your Vice Captain and Hakubei-dono’s investigating the scene.”

“Haku... Kanshi’s at Ninth?” Shunsui’s eyes widened. “Hirata, is that... I mean... what... about Hakubei?”

“It’s all right, Shunsui. I’m fine. The spell was broken,” Hakubei himself materialised in the courtyard at that moment, stopping dead at the scene of destruction and carnage, and letting out a low whistle. “Or wait, maybe I shouldn’t be telling you I’m fine. Maybe I should ask you if you are. Shunsui, what did you do?”

“Killed Aizen Keitarou.” Though Shunsui’s words were calm enough, Hirata knew his friend well enough to hear the faint tremor in his voice. “I’m sure you remember that the Council initiated a Kill on Sight order. I saw. I killed. As Hirata says, we’re done here, and there’s other things to do.”

“Hang on, you’re not going anywhere,” as he made to get to his feet, Hakubei was beside him, pushing him back down onto the heap of rubble with a hefty sigh. ‘Nagesu-sama’s going to come back and implode — both literally and figuratively — if he sees all this and there’s no official report of what happened here. Hirata-dono,’ he glanced across at his fellow Captain, “you’re a Council member, as you reminded me on our way over. You ought to take charge of all of this. It’s not pretty, but like Ninth, it can’t just be walked away from.”

“Perhaps, and I don’t mind, but...” Hirata’s gaze slid back towards Shunsui, who caught it, holding up his hands and offering a feeble smile.

“I’m okay, Hirata. At least, I will be,” he assured his friend, and Hirata arched an eyebrow.

“You just killed a man,” he said softly. “For me, that might not mean much, but I’ve always envied the way you, and Juushirou, and people like you feel about life and death. You can value things on a different level — ways in which I’ve gradually lost since I fully awakened Tsumi no Fuuhi. You don’t need to pretend this doesn’t bother you. It ought to bother you, like it obviously bothers Hakubei-dono. It doesn’t make it any less right, but you can’t push it away as though it doesn’t matter. You’re not me. Be glad of it.”

“Mm,” Shunsui carefully pushed Hakubei aside, getting to his feet and moving slowly across the yard, stopping a foot or two from the body and retrieving his swords from where he had discarded them. Glancing at them, he sighed, giving them a little shake and returning them to their sealed form. The longer katana blade was still smeared with blood, and though he sheathed the wakizashi, he kept the other out, examining its tarnished surface.

“With Juushirou, it was Seibara, but I guess it takes a demon to kill a demon,” he murmured, more to himself than to his companions, but Hirata’s keen hearing heard every word.

“Shunsui...”

“I’ll be all right, really I will,” Shunsui turned to face him, and Hirata was relieved to see a faint flicker of something familiar in his friend’s gaze. “However much blood is on my hands, Hirata, doing this means the people I care about are still alive, and that’s enough for me.”

“The people you...” Hirata shot him a sharp look, then, “Juushirou? This had something to do with... was Juushirou here too? I didn’t sense Sougyo no Kotowari... in fact, I didn’t sense it at all through this fight. Are you saying... something happened to...”

“Juu is fine, at least, I assume so. I haven’t seen him, but I’m sure he wouldn’t go down without a fight,” Shunsui shook his head. “I came here alone to kill Keitarou, and there was nobody else here when I came. No officers of any kind, actually — unconscious, dead, or otherwise. That’s something that’ll need to be looked into — among everything else.”

He wiped the katana against the leg of his hakama, sliding it reluctantly into its sheath.

“It will take some time to clean,” he reflected, “as will that.”

He pointed to the dishevelled haori, his brow creasing as he caught sight of the red stains covering his hands.

“I don’t even know if these ever clean, metaphorically,” he added absently, and Hakubei frowned, reaching out his own right hand impulsively and grabbing Shunsui’s bloodstained fist in his, giving it a firm shake.

“Hakubei?” Shunsui stared at the other Captain, nonplussed, and Hakubei offered him a sheepish grin.

“This may sound really cheesy,” he warned, “but I’ll still shake your hand, no matter how bloody it is. The man you killed was a traitor, he killed Hirata-dono’s son and he made me fight my younger sister. He made us try to kill each other, but now he can’t do that to anyone else and I’m glad. It’s somewhere you don’t ever want to be, trust me. What you did was the right thing, and it probably saved a lot of other lives. So I don’t mind shaking your hand. I don’t care if I get bloody, because if I’d found him, I’d have tried to kill him too. Only I probably wouldn’t have succeeded, because I don’t have the same kind power as you.”

Shunsui glanced at the Shiba Captain for a moment, then he returned the grin with the first half-genuine smile Hirata had seen since they entered the courtyard. He nodded, claspig his left fist over the top of Hakubei’s right in confirmation of the gesture.

“Welcome back, Hakubei. I’m glad Sora didn’t skewer you before Keitarou’s control was broken,” he said sincerely. “It’s nice to have your faith in me. I only hope Juu will be as understanding.”

“I can’t imagine Ukitake will have any compunction about the need to remove this man from existence,” Hakubei assured him, and Shunsui shrugged.

“We’ll see, I suppose,” he mused. ‘We did, a long time ago, promise to take down Keitarou together. I left him out and I did it on purpose. He’s going to have issues with me over that... and maybe other things, too, when he knows the full story. Still, at least I’m alive to be able to explain it to him.’ He shrugged. “Nothing worse than being a corpse without a good alibi... better to do the job properly and have time to think up your excuses later.”

“For now, the first thing is to report that Keitarou has been killed,” Hirata reflected. “I’ll do it, since as Hakubei-dono says, I’m representative of the Council of Elders.”

“If I thought anyone would believe it, I’d give you credit for the killing, too, but it will only take ten seconds of Unohana-taichou’s time to expose the truth,” Shunsui admitted. “My reiatsu’s all over him — my sword went right up inside of him. He lost Katen’s game... there’s no pretending this was a Wind Hawk kill, much as I wish it were otherwise.”

“Better to be honest about it,” Hakubei advised. “Come on. Let Hirata-dono make the report he needs to make. We should search Third for any sign that there were shinigami on duty here. Someone should have been here... and if they weren’t, we need to discover why not.”

There had been fighting in Seireitei.

Kai stepped out of the Second Division’s restricted Senkaimon, pausing to sniff the air with a grim expression on his face. Though the surrounds were quiet, the air was thick with fragmented reiryoku and the scent of burning, and as he registered this, Kai’s stomach twisted itself into an uneasy knot. Had they come back too late? It was difficult to know how much time the Onmitsukidou had exhausted, searching the Spiritless Zone for their prey, but though he had tried to be as swift as possible, it was clear that the hostilities had already begun.

And maybe, the battle was already won and lost.

His lips thinned at this thought, but he did not speak his concerns aloud, aware that the slightest slip in his composed mask would make the captive Endou hime suspicious. Though she had submitted herself reluctantly to his men, and had not attempted to escape during the return, Kai knew that he was bargaining a chip he did not hold to maintain her docility, and, more to the point, this was not the frightened young teenager he had first encountered in District Eight several decades earlier.

Eiraki had lived on the run with Keitarou for all of her adult life, had birthed three children and raised them in hiding, and had severed all ties with her noble background in order to protect the man she loved. She had spent more time with Keitarou than she had her own kin, and, undoubtedly, it had shaped the woman she had become. Glancing back at her now, shackled between Karaki and Saku as she stepped out of the Gate, Kai was struck by the calm expression on her features, her lashes showing not even the slightest sign of tears. She was not afraid, he realised with a jolt. It was the face of a person secure in her convictions... a person who had no doubts about the path she had chosen to walk.

Even if that path led to death.

“Kai-dono, where do you want us to take the prisoner?” Karaki’s question broke through his thoughts, and he frowned, scanning the surrounding area briefly for any sign of his sister’s reiatsu. Finding no evidence of Midori’s return, he nodded, making up his mind.

“We’ll take her to the lower cells,” he decided. “Saku, you will be responsible for ensuring our captive hime is searched for anything that might be considered an offensive weapon.”

“Yes, sir,” Saku nodded her head soberly, and Eiraki snorted, looking amused.

“Are you afraid of searching me yourself, Kai-dono?” she asked mockingly. “You make me wonder if, even at your age, you’ve yet to set eyes on the body of a woman.”

“Your views weren’t asked for,” Karaki interjected darkly, raising his hand as though to slap her, but Kai moved quickly, grasping Karaki's wrist and shaking his head.

"You are a hime and the sister of a friend of mine," he said softly, releasing his hold and addressing Eiraki directly. "I will treat you with respect for his sake, rather than for yours."

"I imagine he doesn't care too much either way," Eiraki shrugged her shoulders. "He's an Endou, Kai-dono. Endou don't care too much about things like that."

"But you care for the life of your son, just as he cared for the life of his," Kai said evenly. "No more talking. Now we're back in Seireitei, Endou Eiraki-hime, you will be arraigned for the murder of Kuchiki Ribari, and the additional charges of colluding with and aiding and abetting the escape of a wanted traitor to Seireitei. These are serious crimes, and you will therefore be confined in a secure cell until such a time as the Council of Elders choose to hear and judge your case. You should not expect to be treated with mercy, but you will be given the chance to give your story before judgement is passed. The sentence for the crimes you are charged with is death, and if you are guilty, sentence will be carried out swiftly and in a manner of the Council's devising. Do you have any questions?"

"Not a question. Rather, two requests," Eiraki's eyes glittered with a hint of the feral defiance she had shown in the Spiritless Zone, and Kai knew that nothing of the young girl's innocence was left in the woman who stood before him. "Firstly, that you honour your word as regards my son. If you want me to continue cooperating with you, I would like to see him, to see for myself that he is safe and alive. And secondly, that you amend your address of me. I am a wife and a mother, Kai-dono. I left the Endou a long time ago. My name is Aizen Eiraki, now."

Her lips twitched into a humourless smile.

"And don't be sorry if my husband comes to collect what's his," she murmured. "You're not a match for someone like him."

"I haven't much interest in seeing your husband," Kai said frankly. "Saku, take her into the ante-chamber and search her. If she resists, you may use restraining Kidou, but do not harm her unless she poses you a threat. Ensure she is comfortable, then take her below and secure her in cell deep-six. I will remember your requests," this last to Eiraki. "If it is within my power, I will grant them... providing my doing so doesn't bring the boy's life in harm's way. Taking him from his secure holding place might make him a target... but I keep my word, and I will honour it as best I can."

“Then I suppose I will go with your underling,” Eiraki sniffed. “You needn’t worry. So long as you keep your word, I won’t fight. You can put me in the most depressing place possible, Kai-dono, but you can’t break me. You won’t find out anything about Kei-sama from me, nor will I sacrifice him to save my life. You might as well prepare for my execution — I’m not afraid.”

Kai’s gaze flitted to Saku, who nodded, slipping her fingers around Eiraki’s wrists and giving her a little tug in the direction of the barracks reserved particularly for members of the Onmitsukidou and the briefing and searching of their incoming prisoners. Eiraki did not put up any kind of resistance and, as they disappeared, Kai sank back against the wall, letting out his breath in a rush.

“Karaki?”

“Sir?” Immediately the officer was alert, and Kai cast him a rueful smile.

“Go to Thirteenth. Tell Ukitake-taichou that we’ve caught ourselves a sparrow,” he instructed. “Tell him that she’s secure in the cell and he’s to act on it as he sees fit. Also, tell him to make sure his own prisoner remains alive, at least for the time being.”

“Yes, sir,” Karaki did not ask any questions, raising his hand in a salute. Before he could move, however, the atmosphere was split and split again by jagged threads of Kidou energy, and, loud and clear, Kai was aware of Hirata’s voice breaking through the ether.

“This is Endou Hirata, Seventh Division Captain, transmitting to all available officers within Inner Seireitei.”

Tenteikuura.

Hurriedly gathering his wits, Kai realised that his friend had activated the powerful communications spell, and his heart constricted again as he contemplated the reasons for such a broadcast. From Karaki’s expression, he knew that Hirata had not bothered to limit the transmission to Captains and Vice Captains alone, and that suggested either urgency or desperation. Hastily he tried to decipher the threads of broken reiryoku that littered his surroundings, but it was in vain, for though he could identify who had released their spirit power, he could not discern the roles they had played in the battle. Everything was overlaid with a heavy, unfamiliar spiritual presence that seemed to penetrate every orifice, and Kai found himself wondering how Hirata had managed to transmit such a clear kidou connection through the morass of swirling energy.

Hirata’s next words drove all other thoughts from his mind.

“The exile, Aizen Keitarou has been apprehended and killed at Third Division. Repeat, the exile, Aizen Keitarou has been apprehended and killed at Third Division. All unhurt officers should report to their Division Barracks and await further instructions from their Captain or Vice Captain. The exile, Aizen Keitarou has been apprehended and killed at Third Division. All unhurt officers report to Division barracks and await further instructions.”

The message crackled to a stop, and for a moment, Kai could not speak, half-doubting what he had just heard as a dream or wishful thinking. He met Karaki's gaze, seeing the normally impassive officer's eyes huge with shock at what had just been transmitted, and Kai felt certain the man had forgotten in its entirety the instruction he had been given only moments before.

And then, breaking through the silence, was the sound of an ear-splitting, heart-wrenching scream.

It took Kai a split-second to realise that it had come from the Division ante-chamber, and he jerked into life, gesturing for Karaki to follow him as he drew his sword, charging towards the structure where Saku and the prisoner now were. Aware that he could be barging in on Eiraki in a state of undress, he steeled himself, for the sound had been so unearthly and alien that he had not been able to tell whether it was his officer or the hime herself who had let out the terrible cry. Had Eiraki turned on Saku in a moment of distraction? Knowing that the girl had carried poison before, Kai knew there was no guarantee Eiraki's lack of spirit power would prevent her from causing serious harm, but as he flung back the door, he found Saku hunched on the floor, crouched over something limp and dark that lay, motionless, on the ground.

“Eiraki-hime!” He darted forward, anxiety in his gaze. “Saku, what happened? We heard the scream — are you hurt?”

“No, sir. Not me,” Saku shook her head, and Kai could see the sombre expression in the woman's eyes. “There was a message, sir. From Endou-taichou. I trust you heard it too?”

“Karaki and I both did,” Kai confirmed, glancing at the officer in his slipstream, who nodded his head. “It was Tenteikuura, Saku. Kidou.”

“Yes...” Saku bent to brush hair out of Eiraki's face, and Kai saw for the first time how pale his prisoner looked, and the lashes which had been so dry at her arrest were now wet with tears. “Well, she heard it to, sir. I don't know as she was meant to, but she did. And when she did...”

She held up her arms, turning them over, and Kai saw red scratch marks across the skin. He frowned.

“You said you weren’t hurt.”

“Something like this doesn’t constitute ‘hurt’ when you wear an Onmitsukidou uniform,” Saku said grimly. “I was going to use a spell to hold her back, because I thought she was going to try and escape, but she was going into panic. I tried to stop her, but when I grabbed at her, she screamed. Next thing I knew...”

She gestured to the limp form, and Kai let out a heavy sigh, removing his black gloves and putting an index finger to Eiraki’s throat.

“She’s alive. She’s just fainted,” he said softly. “Take her downstairs, Saku, and secure her. I’m sure that we could’ve found another way to break it to her, than for her to hear her brother announce her husband’s death. We need to know what happened, but for now, securing this captive is of prime importance. Even if Hirata’s message is true and not a ruse of some kind, Eiraki has a son whose whereabouts are unknown and whose behaviour is known to be unpredictable. Until we can be certain he isn’t in the vicinity, we can’t take chances. Not even with an unconscious girl.”

He grasped Saku’s arm, gazing at the wounds, then.

“Go clean up,” he instructed, releasing his hold. “Karaki, you take Eiraki down below. Cell deep-six.”

“Yes, sir,” Karaki’s brows furrowed, “but what about Ukitake-taichou? Should I go there once Eiraki-hime is locked away?”

“No...” Kai pursed his lips, then shook his head. “No, I’m going to keep you here. Ukitake will have received the same transmission we did. He wanted Eiraki as a pawn for negotiation, but if Keitarou is dead, then such a tactic is no longer necessary and a direct report superfluous. I’d rather we stayed in this vicinity, just in case we’re still in danger. We haven’t been here and we don’t know what’s gone on in our absence — until someone comes for us, or Midori-nee returns, we’ll keep close and defend our patch.”

“Yes, sir,” Karaki saluted, bending to scoop the unconscious hime up in his arms. He was gone the next second, and Kai cast Saku a grin.

“Go,” he said firmly. “I’ll see to the rest of the men. I can debrief without your help, and I’d rather you cleaned those scratches, then took a trip to the Fourth, just in case Eiraki brought something back with her and thought to share it with you.”

“Like poison?” Saku glanced at her arms thoughtfully, then shrugged. “All right, sir, but I’m not afraid. I feel fine — but I’ll do as you say.”

“I’d rather be safe than lose my right hand woman,” Kai told her. “I just hope that Hirata’s message marks the end of the conflict. Not the beginning.”

“He’s asleep.”

Mitsuki laid Kohaku’s arm gently down against the blankets, moving to brush the messy hair out of the young man’s face. His eyes were closed, his breathing steadying as he sank deeper into a dreamless stupor.

From the other side of the bed, Juushirou sat back, letting out a heavy sigh. The chamber was dimly lit, the Kidou lamps turned down low in an attempt to create a soothing atmosphere, but it was not dark enough to conceal the tears still drying on the stray’s lashes, nor the evidence of the emotional storm of grief that had overtaken him the moment he had known his father was dead. The formal confirmation of it had come moments before, in Hirata’s crackly Tenteikuura transmission, and Juushirou knew that, this time, there had been no miraculous, last minute escape. It ought to have made him happy, but Kohaku’s clear distress had tempered the triumph considerably.

“What have we done, Mitsuki?” he asked plaintively, and Mitsuki cast him a glance across the bed, pausing, and then moving to sit beside him. She reached out a hand, taking Juushirou’s pale fingers in hers and giving them a little squeeze of reassurance.

“What shinigami are meant to do,” she said softly. “Protect the people we most need to protect.”

“Yes, but at what cost?” Juushirou slid his fingers away from her touch, using them to press against his brow as he tried to smooth out the creases of tension. “I’ve wanted to stop Keitarou for the longest time, Mitsuki, and now we know that finally, he’s been stopped. I should be relieved, but instead I feel guilty. To us he was an enemy, but to Koku...”

He trailed off, his gaze flitting to the boy’s face.

“I remember my own father’s death,” he admitted quietly. “I found out about it whilst still in the throes of the worst childhood fever I had ever had. I overheard my mother, talking to the doctor about it. I was trapped, helpless to do anything, even to cry. I didn’t even get a chance to say goodbye. More than anything I knew that he had died protecting me... and for a long time, I blamed myself. Maybe on some levels, I still do. Perhaps that's why I've always worked so hard to make this life worth his dying for. I trained, overcame my fear of Hollows, and I took Thirteenth's haori along the way. Doing so meant, ultimately, that enemies like Keitarou would have to be eliminated. I never thought about it from this perspective. I never thought of Keitarou's children, and how they might feel if that day came to pass. It's such a complicated sensation... and I don't know what I ought to do for the best."

Mitsuki's lips pressed together thoughtfully and to begin with, she did not speak. Then, eventually, she broke the silence.

"You can only do as much as he lets you do, Juushirou," she said simply. "Kohaku is Keitarou's son. That won't stay hidden now — it's not possible to conceal him any longer. I didn't see the hallucination you and Houjou-kun and Naoko-chan mentioned, because of the Kidou barrier at the Fourth, but I could sense Koku's presence in the air the moment I stepped out into the centre thoroughfare. People will want to know what happened, and ultimately, the truth will come out. It will have to. Your job now is to ensure that it comes out in a way that keeps both the promises we made — yours to Souja-dono and mine to Katsura — to keep Koku safe."

"He's already not safe," Juushirou's response was a sobering one. "Physically, perhaps, but his emotions are raw and unsettled. Those tears weren't crocodile tears, nor were they tears of fright. They were tears that only a son can cry when a father is taken from him."

"Or a daughter, when a mother's soul drifts away into the mist," Mitsuki reflected.

"Perhaps that's true," Juushirou offered her a faint smile. "I'm sorry. You have those kinds of memories, too."

"Mm," Mitsuki's expression became thoughtful. "What exactly did he say to you, Juushirou? About what happened... about Keitarou?"

"He told me he'd asked Shunsui to kill his father, and Shunsui had," Juushirou bit his lip. "Even if he hadn't told me, I would have known, though. I know Shunsui better than anyone else does — or at least, I'd like to think that I do. I've known him fight seriously, but there was a raw, dark edge to his release this time. I knew he was fighting with intent, and I think, somewhere, I knew who he was fighting. I didn't know Koku had sent him to do it... and Shunsui isn't someone you think of as exuding natural killer instinct. But in times like this, I think we both know he can muster it. Years ago, he released Katen Kyoukotsu's blade into the shadows and used it to wound Keitarou's shoulder. Then, he seemed darker than I'd ever known him to be before. Perhaps then I knew that, one day, he would kill Keitarou for real. Sensei told him that Katen Kyoukotsu probably would be capable of wielding that power. Today was that day, and he completed that task. I didn't need Hirata's notification. I already knew what Shunsui was doing."

He sighed.

"And I sat back and let him."

"It's a good thing you did," Mitsuki observed, and Juushirou stared at her in surprise.

"Mitsuki? You're a healer — I thought you didn't believe in killing?"

"I don't," Mitsuki shook her head. "I was thinking in other terms... about your safety in all of this. Keitarou would've probably tried to kill you."

"I wouldn't have let him succeed. I'm not a child now, nor fresh out of training."

"No, perhaps not, but it would've distracted Kyouraku-kun, and both of you might have ended up hurt," Mitsuki offered him a faint smile. "Juushirou, you know that Kyouraku-kun's weakness isn't in his sword power or his kidou skills. It's when something he wants to protect is part of the equation. He probably didn't tell you about this because he knows it as well as I do. Having you there would've compromised both of you. Your job was to find and protect Koku, which you did, and maintain security over the Thirteenth, which you did. Your subordinates helped to secure Twelfth and Eleventh and no deaths in this sector have been reported."

"No deaths here, but elsewhere..." Juushirou's brow creased again, then he sighed, shrugging his shoulders.

"You're right, and it does nothing to dwell on it," he acknowledged. "My duty is still to manage the Koku situation, else more blood might be shed and this time it might be the blood of an innocent party."

"But you are decided to protect him?" Mitsuki asked, and Juushirou nodded.

"Like you said, I promised Souja," he agreed. "I'm sorry you never had a real opportunity to meet him — he was a smart boy with intelligent judgement. This was the last and only thing I could do for the son of a good friend, and so I'll make sure I do it right. How much Souja knew about the boy who brought him back here, I don't know. Whether he suspected Koku was his cousin or whether he just wanted to protect a Rukongai boy who had taken a risk to help him, I don't know. Either way, I gave my word and I will keep it, to the best of my ability."

"Then you'll also have to address the question of that," Mitsuki's gaze slid across the chamber, and Juushirou followed her glance to where the glistening silver-bladed zanpakutou lay on the shelf beside the window.

"Kyouka Raigen," he murmured, and Mitsuki arched an eyebrow.

"You know its name?"

"Koku told me," Juushirou admitted. "Whatever he did to disseminate that vision seems to have cemented his bond with the voice inside his head. I don't know what kind of zanpakutou is born from one of Keitarou's creations, but there it is. Koku wasn't too coherent about it, but he did say they'd talked lately in a different way from how it had been in the past. They finally made an accord... but the fact he now has it means that, even if he wanted to be let loose into Outer Seireitei, it can't happen. A zanpakutou isn't a toy, and it's not something that can be discarded easily. Koku's spirit power was unstable before, but now it's fundamentally unsafe. Even if it seems more settled than it did, he's been given a weapon and no understanding of how to use it or even if it should be used."

"This sounds like something Sensei might have said," Mitsuki nudged him, amused, and Juushirou looked sheepish.

"I think it was Kyouki-sama who gave me the lecture on how dangerous my sword was and how I didn't realise how easily I could kill someone if I used it without proper care and training," he ruminated, "but probably Sensei covered it in one or other Sakusen or Zanjutsu lecture along the way. Who it came from doesn't make it any less the truth. Like it or not, one of our shinigami brought Koku here, and we, through our involvement with him, have made him raise his sword. We are aware of him, and we have a responsibility to deal with what comes next. My first step, though, is to get the Council to repeal the Kill on Sight order, and to overcome the little matter of Koku's having come from Rukongai illegally. The latter might be explained by his aid to Souja, but the former is much tougher. I won't have an innocent boy murdered for no reason, especially now the core of the problem has been handled... so until that has been done, Koku can't leave the safety of these barracks. Maybe not even this room... though at present, with all he has to come to terms with, that might be best.”

“Perhaps,” Mitsuki looked troubled. “Juushirou, he’s still not strong. He’s settled his spirit power, but I can’t be sure if its quieted because he used such a lot of it to project that hallucination. I had no inkling that he had so much reiryoku at his disposal, to be honest. Given his physical state, using half such an amount ought to have killed him on the spot, but it didn’t. He may be more resilient than he looks — or his power thresholds have been misleading on account of him having some of it stored inside this wonder-sword of Keitarou’s, but more than ever now, he needs to eat. I gave him sugar water to drink with the sleeping draught, because it will help his blood sugar levels on a short-term basis, but more than before, he needs nourishment. His body must rebuild — or you might find the Council’s order becomes academic.”

“Is he really so much at risk?” Juushirou became aghast. “With the sword being summoned, I had hoped...”

“He’s not like you,” Mitsuki interrupted gently, resting a hand on his arm, and this time Juushirou did not pull away. “You had a genetic weakness which was aggravated by your reiryoku. It’s still there, but your control over Sougyo has helped you manage it so that it no longer threatens your life in the way it once did. Irrespective of his power levels, Koku has no genetic defect like yours. His weakness is simply a lack of reserve — maybe a lack of nutrition dating back to the day he was born. He is underweight, and when he uses his energy, his body isn’t refuelling. He says he isn’t hungry, but probably he’s so hungry he’s stopped feeling it. It might be insensitive, but, grief or not, if he’s going to come through this, he needs to eat.”

“I don’t really want to resort to force-feeding, not when he’s so vulnerable emotionally,” Juushirou owned. “When he wakes, if he’s calmer, I’ll try discussing it with him again.”

He glanced at his hands, turning them over pensively.

“You know, the thing that makes me feel worst about all of this is the way he reacted, when he knew Keitarou had died,” he murmured. “I don’t mean his tears, but... but the way in which he reacted to me. He reached out to me, he didn’t push me away. A shinigami had just killed his father, and he knows that I’m the close friend of that shinigami. Yet he didn’t want me to leave him. I felt... somehow like I was betraying him, by comforting him at such a vulnerable point. But what else could I do? He was hurting, and Mitsuki, I understood that pain too well not to try and help.”

Mitsuki snorted, shaking her head in disbelief.

“You don’t get it, even after all these years,” she said mock-wearily. “Ukitake Juushirou, I don’t know if I’m relieved or exasperated to find that twenty five years have passed but you’re still as dense to your own charisma as ever you were before. You have that knack with people and you always have. Koku trusts you — no, I’d go further than that, I’d say he’s come to look up to you in a way that was outside of Keitarou’s plans. You’ve treated the boy fairly and honestly from the start, and even when you’ve found out things about him, you’ve kept faith. Even when he went with Keitarou, you didn’t give up on him. You went out, you found him, you brought him back and made sure he was safe. You are Kohaku’s anchor, now, in a foreign world where he no longer has any family to fall back on. And, when he needed you most, you were there. You’ve never seen him as a monster or an outlaw’s son, or a stray from Rukongai. You’ve seen him as someone you can help, and listen to. If he’s going to get well, and get over this, it will be with your help. You’re all he has, now. You might not be his family, but didn’t you tell me that Thirteenth Division was a family in itself? Koku’s one chance now is to belong to that family — and, perhaps on a subconscious, instinctive level, that’s something he knows too. He’s been abandoned once already. I don’t think he could cope if he was abandoned by you, too.”

“Your judgement of me is always favourably biased,” Juushirou sent his companion a crooked smile, despite himself, and Mitsuki grinned.

“I’m perfectly capable of calling you an idiot and I always have been,” she assured him, “but deep down, nothing has changed. You have a haori and it threw me for six a little when I came back here. I’d been through something I’d rather never repeat, and I didn’t expect all the changes I’d have to adjust to. You have a family of people dependant on you, and maybe I felt a little bit intimidated by that fact. But you’ve protected me over the business with Katsura, and you’ve allowed me to stay here and rebuild my confidence and my healing skills, even though I made a reckless decision and allowed a felon to fly free. I guess I know you wouldn’t let any harm come to me if you could prevent it... though I am sorry that I acted in a way that might’ve put you in that position.”

“The fact you let Katsura go is tempered by what he told you about Koku,” Juushirou’s cheeks reddened slightly, and he turned his gaze hastily away. “Probably it’s also my bias, not wanting to report you, but I think you’ve been through enough. Besides, I want to believe in the Katsura you and Koku both know, not the man I saw in Seventh that day. I want to believe that he can change. I'm sure there are plenty who'd say it was just another idealistic whim of mine... but... if I wasn't idealistic, I couldn't do this job. Working as a Captain isn't easy. I'm not friends with all my comrades, and I have significantly less political influence than all of them. I have had to learn more subtle and sometimes sneaky ways to get around roadblocks, and bit by bit I've learned them. I constantly have to remind myself that if I really want to make a difference to Seireitei and prove how District Shinigami can do their bit, I need to stand up for the things I believe in and not let the Clans batter me down."

He shrugged, looking awkward.

"You're also something I believe in," he said pensively. "You're a Clan hime who gave up a life with every material pleasure and possibility in order to live in rough camps in Rukongai, tending to people most of Seireitei never even think of. Your doing that often inspired me to keep going. And, since we've been in Seireitei, life has been less chaotic. Working in Seventh District probably taught me everything I didn't need to know about the dark side of the Clans... but it ultimately hardened my belief in what really matters."

"And now Seventh have a Division of their own with a good Captain at the helm," Mitsuki observed, "so you clearly did a good job."

"Maybe," Juushirou's lips thinned. "The Hirata I work with now isn't the same boy we went to school with, not in a lot of ways. In Seventh District, little by little, I came to realise that was the case. The more Tsumi no Fuuhi developed, the more he had to fight against its instincts. Ultimately I learned that what keeps Hirata from becoming a ruthless, indiscriminate killer isn't necessarily his nature, or even the fact that he has certain emotional standards that other Endou just didn't have. The different factor is that Hirata came to the Academy and met all of us. He learned different viewpoints before his spirit power was allowed to dominate, and so he wants to be like us, not like his kin. He works so very hard to maintain it — and to keep the shreds of compassion and humanity he learned from five years at school. But, on one occasion in Seventh District, I came to realise that the only person there who was able to manage his excesses was me. Even now, Shunsui and I, we're the ones who keep the Wind Hawk in check, and, having seen what it can do, sometimes that knowledge frightens me."

"Why this all of a sudden?" Mitsuki looked surprised, and Juushirou sighed.

“Based on the reports that have trickled through since the cessation of hostilities, Hirata was forced to fight and kill Anabomi Seizuku, at Ninth,” he responded. “Anabomi was half Hollow, and there really doesn’t seem to have been anything else that could’ve been done, but even so, I don’t think Hirata’s taken a person’s life with that sword of his since the days when he was my Third Seated Officer and I caught him playing death vigilante on those who plotted my assassination. I hope his having to take a life today isn’t going to set back that resolve. Hirata’s spirit wants to kill — its in his nature and his sword, even if he himself doesn’t. It just worries me...”

“That Hirata will react violently when the truth about Koku comes out, and will see him as fair game because of what happened to Souja?” As the implications clicked into place, Mitsuki’s expression became one of consternation.

“I don’t know,” Juushirou admitted. “I cut him out of knowing what I told Shunsui, because I didn’t want to risk it. Hirata may have sated his pent up rage on dealing with Anabomi, but if I know him, he’ll have held back. The fact there’s still a corpse we can apparently identify as Anabomi is a good indication that he didn’t give the Wind Hawk its head. He was fighting a comrade and putting him out of his misery, he wasn’t out for blood. But the girl who killed Souja was killed already by one of Hirata’s own agents, and Keitarou was killed by one of his friends. There’s nobody for him to unleash his paternal grief on... except Koku.”

“Then that makes dealing with the Council a trickier prospect,” Mitsuki realised. Juushirou nodded.

“I might alienate a friend, but I know I can stop that friend, and so if I have to, I guess I will,” he said wearily. “It’s not what I want, Mitsuki, but I know Hirata when he’s angry. In this state, Koku couldn’t defend himself. Plus, there’s another element. Souja is dead. Hirata has no heir. However, his sister has sons, and despite her indiscretions, Eiraki has never been formally cut from the family tree. Two sons, both alive as far as we know. Katsura has given you his word to keep away from Seireitei, though Seventh continue to hunt for him and probably always will. Even if he did come here, he’d be arrested — he’s a wanted criminal and therefore any claim he might ever have had to the Endou Clan is forfeit. They’d never accept him... he’d be torn to shreds — if not by Hirata himself, then probably by Kikyue. Koku, however, has committed no crime at all. The Endou may see him as a legitimate challenge to their leader. Because Koku’s blood connection is through his mother, and the Endou are still highly chauvenistic about transference of power, there’d be no way for Hirata to name Koku his heir through peaceable means, even if he was so inclined. But — and it's a big but — the Endou Clan will recognise a leader of close enough blood, born through the female line, if they can kill the existing leader in fair combat.”

“I’m sure none of that has occurred to Koku at all,” Mitsuki objected.

“Probably not, but I’m sure it will occur to Hirata, and to Misashi-sama, who still has significant political power whilst Hirata is here on duty,” Juushirou said gravely. “The long and the short of it is that I will have to go before the Council and make a case that not only prevents Koku being tried and killed simply because he’s Keitarou’s son and comes from Rukongai, but also justify why we hid him for so long, neutralise the threat posed by an angry Endou with serious dynastic concerns... and, in the middle of all of this, attempt to keep hold of my haori. It’s going to be a long and interesting day, that one — and hopefully I’ll have a little while to prepare my case. Today has thrown me for six a little — and it keeps getting more complicated.”

“Well, whatever you decide to do, I’ll back you up,” Mitsuki promised. “I’m only an unranked healer with zero clout in any quarter, but regardless, I will. I’m part of the protect Koku conspiracy movement, because I believe it’s the right thing to do. And like you believe in me, I believe in you.”

She reached up to kiss him on the cheek.

“Besides, you’re good at negotiating with difficult people, and you kill them with kindness — isn’t that how Kyouraku-kun used to put it?” she said lightly, as Juushirou cast her a startled look. “When you’re done reducing them to their component atoms, I hope we’ll get a chance to sit down and talk about other things, but for now, all you need to know is that I’ll back you up — and I’ll do what I can to make Koku more comfortable whilst the war of ideals is raging on around him.”

“I appreciate that,” Juushirou offered her a grin. “Even if you are an unranked healer with zero clout, I feel better when I know you’re on side.”

“I’m glad to hear it,” there was no mistaking the genuine pleasure that sparkled in Mitsuki’s eyes at these words, and she got to her feet, resting her hand gently on his shoulder before turning towards the door. “While it’s quiet, I’ll go back to Fourth and beg some extra supplies. Maybe I can find something that will help stimulate appetite, or at least, suppress the fits of nausea and dizziness his reiryoku seems to bring on. Koku should sleep for a bit, so you can start plotting how to take on the Powers That Be.”

Before Juushirou could respond, there was a knock at the door of the chamber and it slid back to reveal Enishi, a bothered expression on his genial features.

“Sorry to butt in on the both of you like this,” he said, by way of preamble, “but there’s messengers at the gate, Taichou, and they want to speak to you.”

“To me?” Juushirou’s brows knitted together, but he got to his feet, nodding his head. “I’ll come, then — but from where? I thought we’d received all the relevant reports from the day’s events and the rest was going to wait until the missing Captains returned?”

“Well, that’s what the message is about, sir,” Enishi looked rueful. “The message is from Nagesu-sama. Erm. Well. Actually... he gave it in person, but left a couple of his officers to see it was carried through.”

“What?” Juushirou’s eyes almost fell out of his head, and Mitsuki cast him a dismayed glance. “But the Senkaimon... I thought that...”

“Apparently it’s not so easy to strand a scientist Captain in the Real World by simply blowing up one main Gate,” Enishi scratched his head. “No clue how they did it, but the whole damn lot of them just turned up and started pouring out of the Gate that used to stand between here and Twelfth. I was on my way back here, since Atsushidono’s men were waking up and Sekime-taichou’s been trotted off to Fourth to be checked over. They gave me the fright of my life, coming out of nowhere like that. I had no chance to ask for any explanations, though it looks like they were bringing back some injured — I didn’t see any corpses, but there was some blood about. That’s all I saw, because Nagesu-sama saw me and pounced on me. Sent two of his officers back here with me to make sure I carried the message direct — it was a job getting them to wait in the main courtyard whilst I came to find you.”

He looked awkward, then,

“I told them I thought you might be bathing,” he admitted sheepishly. “The officers in question are girls... and they got all flustered at the thought of walking in on you naked.”

“I see the sneaky underhand tactics vis-a-vis roadblocks have corrupted even Houjou-kun,” Mitsuki observed, as Juushirou gave a wry smile, and Enishi shrugged.

“Well, the boy’s here,” he said grimly. “Shikibu filled me in on all the facts behind that. You’re my Captain, Ukitake, so what you say goes and I’m sure you’ve a smarter reason than I can fathom out for taking this line. However, I didn’t s’pose you wanted outsiders traipsing round here turning up stuff before you were ready.”

“Thanks, Enishi. I appreciate that,” Juushirou recovered himself, grimacing. “All right. I’ll come, if that’s the message. Though Nagesu-sama didn’t say anything more specific?”

“Well, he wants to know what you know about Rukongai and the Spiritless Zone,” Enishi replied. “I tried to tell him that he was walking into the middle of a warzone and that nobody really cares too hoots for a patch of Rukongai right now when Ninth’s awash with blood and there are doped up officers staggering all around Eleventh and Twelfth, but he didn’t seem to want to listen. I’m sorry, sir, I did my best, but sometimes a Vice Captain just isn’t an opponent for a Clan Leader.”

“You’ve done all you could, and you can continue by taking charge here and making sure we’re not invaded in my absence,” Juushirou sighed. “I’ll go to Third, and try and limit the damage... though I have a feeling that, once Nagesu-sama sees what’s left of his Senkaimon, he’s not going to be in the mood for a polite chat.”

72. District Steel

Chapter Seventy: District Steel

So, it was time to face the music.

Juushirou gazed up at the entrance of the Council hall, gathering his composure as he tried to settle his nerves. Absently his fingers smoothed the surface of his pristine white haori, though the expression on his face was one of resolution, not of fear. He had made a decision and he would see it through, no matter what.

He had avoided the falling axe the night before, for on his arrival at Third Division he had found the whole place a hive of chaos and activity. Shiketsu had appeared, flustered and apologetic, telling him that Nagesu had been tied up by unforeseen problems, but had asked him to convey a message. There would be a meeting of the Council of Elders the following morning, at first light, and he would be expected to appear there, to discuss matters relating to the day's events. Juushirou had gone home, glad of the short reprieve, and he had spent much of the evening working through the paper documents he had gathered, adding the notes Ketsui and Izumi had put together to the fragmented reports he and Shunsui had uncovered. These were tucked into the folds of his obi, in case they were needed, though somehow he felt that this would be more about answering the questions the right way than it would be providing proof.

There was no avoiding the mention of Kohaku, not now. It had to come out, and all hell would simply have to follow.

“You know, it’s a funny world we live in, Juushirou,”

As he reached the door of the main Chamber, a voice stopped him in his tracks, and he turned, his expression becoming clouded as he recognised the speaker. Shunsui was lounging up against one of the outer pillars, his arms folded nonchalantly across his chest, but it did not escape Juushirou’s attention that, beneath the pink embroidered robe Riri had given him, the Eighth Division Captain wore no official white haori. His wavy brown hair, normally fastened back by an expensive Clan tie, was scattered loose over his shoulders, giving him an unexpectedly casual appearance and belying the rank Seireitei had bestowed upon him at graduation more than two decades before. It was an odd apparel to choose in such an exalted location, and on closer inspection Juushirou noted shadows under his friend’s eyes, evidence that the man had probably not slept the night before. Still, there were no signs of bandages, scrapes or blood, and despite his own complicated feelings about the previous day's events, Juushirou was relieved to see that Shunsui was not injured — at least, not physically.

He paused, eying his friend quizzically, and the other man sighed, shrugging his shoulders.

"They sent for me, first thing, before it was even light. After finding the scene of the crime in his own back yard, Nagesu-sama decided that they wanted to hear from me, before they saw you," he said, answering the question Juushirou had not asked. "I knew you'd be coming here, so I waited around. It's not as though I can do anything, particularly, but Sora has everything under control at Eighth, and I'm feeling a bit of a spare part."

"You're not wearing your haori."

"Bloody and sliced about a bit," Shunsui's expression belied the casual nature of his words. 'Not the best impression when called before the Council. It's going back to Eighth for repair and cleaning, on my brother's orders. Apparently I should take better care of it, but honestly, right now I don't care. It's not something I'm desperate to reacquaint with. This one,' he brushed the pink cloth, "will serve me fine for today."

"I see," Juushirou glanced towards the big oaken door, digesting this. "I suppose it makes sense that they'd want you. A lot happened, yesterday."

"It did," Shunsui confirmed sadly. "And Council logic often leaves much to be desired."

"In what sense?"

"Juu, you can't be oblivious of everything that went on at Third," Shunsui spoke softly, and Juushirou's lips thinned. Slowly he shook his head.

"I'm not," he admitted pensively. "It's not really a good time to discuss it, though."

"No, no it isn't. And there probably won't ever be a good time," Shunsui admitted. "The boy's all right, I trust? He did a number on Nagesu-sama's Senkaimon, but I didn't see hide nor hair of him, so I assumed that your angels of mercy had carried him off."

"Koku is safe, yes," Juushirou confirmed gravely. "He's very upset... but he's safe, and I intend to keep it that way, if I can."

Shunsui flinched slightly at this, and immediately Juushirou felt guilty for his choice of words, but before he could amend them, the other man spoke again.

“Like I say, it’s a funny world,” he observed bitterly. “I’m a murderer, yet I’m made out to be the hero. You protected that kid, and your judgement in doing so saved many, many lives... yet you’re about to be scolded as though you did something wrong. If proof was ever needed that Clan government and the Council system is reaching its sell-by date, that would be it.”

Juushirou eyed his friend for a moment, then he let out his breath in a heavy rush of air.

“We’ll talk, later,” he said softly. “For now, I have to go do what I can for Koku.”

Shunsui pressed his lips together, but there was resignation in his eyes, and he nodded his head. He made no attempt to stop his companion from passing him, and Juushirou placed his hands against the heavy wooden door, pushing it open and slipping into the darkness beyond.

“Ukitake Juushirou,” As he made his obeissance before the Eight members of the Council of Elders, it was Nagesu whose voice broke the oppressive silence. “Thank you for coming so promptly. You understand why you have been summoned here, I think?”

“Yes, sir,” Juushirou raised his head, his gaze scanning quickly around the chamber and taking in the composed, grave expressions on the faces of each individual. They were all present, even Yuuichi, despite the fact that the bulk of First Division, including its Vice Captain, remained stationed at the Academy, and Juushirou’s heart lurched in his throat. The man must have ridden through the night to be able to attend this meeting, as all Senkaimon had been shut down the previous evening following the discovery of Third’s broken Gate, and the fact he had done so told Juushirou the significance this meeting held.

“Then we’d like you to explain to us, Juushirou,” this was Midori. “Stand, and tell us why you asked Nagesu-sama about the Spiritless Zone, what you know about yesterday’s events, and why you withheld information regarding the whereabouts of the outlaw, Aizen Keitarou.”

“The battle may be over, but the war is just beginning,”

Madeki pushed open the door of the side chamber, casting the anxious Shikiki a weary smile and ducking out into the corridor beyond. "The soldiers finish slashing and expect us to stitch up the mess. I'm surprised you chose this life, Shikiki... you're not an Uohana, nor a born healer, and it must be hard on you."

"No, I think it's easier on me than on most," Shikiki returned the smile with a pensive one of her own, moving to the small window embedded in the wall and resting her hands against the glass. "I don't suffer from the reactions some healers do, when faced with another's pain. I want to help, but I've never been overwhelmed by someone else's suffering to the point I can't do my job. It's times like now that I'm glad of it — though, honestly, I never thought Kei-nii... Keitarou would ever go this far."

"Ah yes, you knew him, didn't you?" Madeki dropped back against the wall alongside her, sending her a sidelong glance. "So that expression was for him, then, not for the patients lying in their beds? You're sad that he's dead, or shocked at what he's done?"

"Both," Shikiki lowered her hands, turning to meet his gaze. "It's hard to explain. I haven't forgiven him for hurting people I care about, and probably, I never will. I just find it sad that the man who saved me and treated me so kindly could do such cruel things. I knew he was damaged, but to make Anabomi-taichou slaughter his way through his subordinates, then turn Hollow... is beyond what I thought him able to do. I guess I'm realising that I didn't know him at all... and if I had, what could I have done to stop him?"

"As I understand it, you were eight years old," Madeki observed. "No child can control an adult, even if they want to. It's not your fault, and you shouldn't dwell on it. He chose his path, like you did yours. We need you focused now. I know you're tired, Shikiki — you haven't slept, and you've barely left Mikihara-fukutaichou's side since you were summoned to Ninth — but you can't let things get to you. We're here and we do our job. We have to, because otherwise, they,' he patted the glass, "don't live."

"Mm," Shikiki nodded her head. "I know, but I'd like to stay with him a little longer. I know there's nothing else I can really do, not right now, but... I wasn't able to heal him as fully as I wanted. And I need to check on Shiba-fukutaichou before I take any kind of a break. The bite marks around his shoulder were showing signs of infection, and..."

"And there are other healers, including me, who can take care of Ryuusei-dono," Madeki put a finger gently to her lips, shaking his head. 'I know you consider them all your patients, but you aren't the only healer on duty, and Fourth Division are short-handed but capable of saving lives. Ryuusei-dono's injuries are nasty, but he's stable and resting. The pain medication has kicked in and we're working on the risk of infection. The other members of Fifth and the two young lads from Sixth are also resting comfortably. Aomori is well out of danger now and even if Edogawa's been seconded to Thirteenth to take care of another patient, we can manage. Erika-dono is overseeing Ryuusei-dono herself, and I,' he lowered his hand with a grin, "am making sure you don't burn yourself out. You're a tremendous talent, Shikiki. I never met a healer with your skills and I won't let you overreach your limits."

Shikiki sighed heavily.

"I'm happy that you're smiling, at least," she murmured, more than half to herself, and, as Madeki shot her a quizzical look, she blushed, looking sheepish.

"I know. That sounded rude. I'm sorry, you're my superior officer," she acknowledged. "I guess it's because I'm so used to talking to Juunii without any formality that I just... forgot where I was and who I was talking to for a moment. But when we first met, Madeki-dono, so much had happened and you didn't smile. Now maybe it seems like I'm seeing the real Madeki-dono... and I like him. I mean, you. I mean... I should shut up, before I create all kinds of misunderstandings and wind up getting myself disciplined."

Madeki chuckled, shaking his head.

"For this once, I'll overlook it," he promised. "You're tired, we're overworked, and smiling is an inappropriate reaction anyway given the carnage of the last twenty-four hours. But... it's hard to put into words. Keitarou's death won't bring back my comrades. It won't change anything that's happened, but I feel as though, through that one thing, the world might begin to heal. I don't know how else to see it — but I feel like they didn't die in vain. We can move on, and work hard to do the things they believed in, and it will be all right."

"I hope so," Shikiki recovered herself, looking rueful. "Maybe I am tireder than I thought. Thank you for understanding, sir. I grew up in an unconventional family, and well, formality is one of my weak points."

"I don't suppose Mikihara-fukutaichou cares much about that," Madeki's gaze flitted to the glass divide. "I'm sure he won't mind at all that you ripped apart what was left of his uniform in order to save his life.”

“Now you’re teasing me,” Shikiki objected, and Madeki nodded.

“I am,” he agreed, “but Mikihara owes his life to that lack of formal inhibition, so don’t lose it. I have a feeling that if you’re the calibre of healer that comes from the Districts, we probably need to start recruiting more of you.”

“Madeki-dono! Shikiki!”

A voice prevented Shikiki from answering, and the two healers turned to see Shirogane striding down the corridor towards them. He was robed in a pristine fresh uniform, his badge gleaming on his arm, and gazing at him, Shikiki could hardly believe that he had been in a fight for his life such a short time before. At her glance, he offered a smile, inclining his head in acknowledgement.

“I’m assuming your Captain is at the Council Meeting, because my Captain is,” he said, addressing Madeki. “I asked someone on my way in where Erika-dono was, but I was told that she was with Ryuusei-dono and I didn’t like to disturb her. I was going to leave, but I heard your voices... I trust I’m not intruding.”

“You’re not,” Madeki shook his head, “but I can’t give you much more news on the two officers from your squad. They’re comfortable and they’ll both live — but there’s been no significant change in their condition since they were admitted.”

“I haven’t come about them. I’ve come on Guren-sama’s instruction, to find out about Hyakken,” Shirogane’s features became grave. “Ryuu is at Ninth, taking hold of things there, but at present there’s no native officer to call on and, understandably, things are unsettled as a result.”

“You’ve had a full report about what happened at Ninth?” Madeki asked, and Shirogane nodded.

“I inspected the bodies and the scene myself, last night,” he said grimly. “Ryuu and I both did. Keitarou should be glad that he’s dead, since there were some very angry Kuchiki on our return to Seireitei.”

“Very angry is a contagious symptom at present,” Madeki reflected. “Mikihara-fukutaichou is asleep. We’ve induced a coma, though he wasn’t responsive when we finally managed to bring him here. We didn’t think we’d be able to transfer him from Ninth so soon... but Shikiki worked flat out to keep him stable and so we brought him early this morning. There’s more that can be done for him so close to the heart of Fourth’s supplies and with so many healers on call... so his chances are improved and we'll continue to do what we can."

"You've been treating him?" Shirogane's gaze flitted to Shikiki, who nodded.

"I couldn't completely heal him," she said apologetically. "I wanted to, Shirogane-nii... er... I mean... Shirogane-dono, but I couldn't."

"Shirogane-nii, huh?" Madeki arched an eyebrow. "I see what you mean, Shikiki. Formality really isn't your strong suit."

"It's a long story. We go back a way," Shirogane offered Madeki a rueful smile. "Shikiki saved my life once... and she's never been afraid to tell me exactly what she thinks."

"I'm starting to get that feeling," Madeki remarked. "It's an interesting mindset in a Clan world, but I can see why Retsu-sama has faith in her."

He cast Shikiki a grin.

"I'm going to see Aomori, then look in on the Fifth Division officer with the concussion," he said. "Since Mikihara-fukutaichou is your patient, you can talk Shirogane-dono through his care and his condition, I trust? Just remember what I said about taking a break. There's nothing else you can do right now, except rest and recuperate for whatever hits us next."

With that he was gone, and Shikiki let out a heavy sigh.

"I'm sorry, Shirogane-nii. I didn't mean to drop the friendly nickname like that in front of my superior officer."

"You're tired," Shirogane eyed her critically. "And I'm more interested in Hyakken right now. I was amazed to hear he'd survived. I saw the scene of carnage — more importantly, I know what kind of a swordsman Anabomi is... no, I mean... I mean, was. I trained with him a few times. He could take my sword in a sealed weapon fight — though that's not something I like to broadcast, especially not in light of this particular tragedy. Given the state of the other officers, how is it that Hyakken lived long enough for Hirata-dono to arrive with help?"

"Kidou," Shikiki unfastened the door of the little room, pushing it back with a soft hiss and gesturing for her companion to join her inside. "It's all right. He's very drugged, and so long as we're quiet, he won't be disturbed by us being here. A kidou blast cauterised a lot of the wounds in the chest area, and Anabomi-taichou didn't manage to get to his heart. I'm not sure what else happened, exactly. I heard a rumour that one of Hirata-dono's men jump-started his heart with Tsuzuri Raiden — but I didn't see it happen, so I don't know for certain if its true."

"A lot of people really worked hard to keep him alive," Shirogane let out a low whistle, and Shikiki nodded, settling herself down beside the bed and gesturing for her companion to do the same.

"Starting with Mikihara-fukutaichou himself," she said quietly, extending a chubby index finger to indicate the man's heavily bandaged arms. "He used these to defend himself as much as possible. He took horrendous wounds to his arms, Shirogane-nii. It's amazing that he didn't lose one of them."

"His arms," Shirogane looked troubled. "His sword arm, too?"

"Yes," Shikiki agreed. "His zanpakutou was found at the scene beside him. He lost two fingers on his left hand as well. We couldn't save them. They had to come off, so Retsu-sama removed them. The others we've done our best with. Under the bandages — its more stitch than skin right now."

"And the rest of him?"

"Lacerations to the liver, the spleen, and the small intestine," Shikiki responded. "Lots of muscle and vessel damage, ribs sliced clean through but by some miracle, the lungs weren't perforated. Scorchmarks across his chest, too... it will scar, most likely, if he survives everything else."

"Hrm," Shirogane rested his hand pensively against the bed, then, "And you didn't heal him fully? You didn't use your power on him? Why? You could reverse all of this, surely?"

"I wanted to," Shikiki looked troubled. "I wanted to, Shirogane-nii, but I couldn't. When I first got to Ninth, I tried, but the moment I started increasing the level of power I was using, his pulse began to go into an arrhythmia. I was scared that I might kill him before I cured him, so I scaled back. It's why I had to work on him for so long. He was barely clinging to life when I got there. If not for the kidou cauterising his chest wounds, and whatever hocus-pocus Hirata-dono's man did on him before I got there, he would have been another marked corpse in the autopsy chamber."

She shrugged helplessly.

"I did what I could, but I discovered I have limits," she said at length. "I knew, since I healed you, that I can't reconstitute blood very well. Mikihara-fukutaichou lost a lot of that, but fortunately, not as much as Souja-dono or any of the men in Anabomi-taichou's office. I can heal tissue and organs, but my spirit power is stronger now than it was when I healed you, and that can take a toll on a patient if I'm not really careful. I've healed as much as I dare. I've sealed off all the cut vessels I can find, and through the night I patched up his organs, one by one. I've fixed his abdomen, more or less, but he's still at risk for shock or infection in the burns on his chest. Or his arms."

She grimaced.

"I discovered one more limitation I have," she added unwillingly. "The longer it is since an incident occurred, Shirogane-nii, it's harder for me to reverse it. New tissue begins to form, changes take place... and with each passing moment, a little part of the original reishi is broken away and gone forever, replaced by something new. I saved you because I could find all the parts of you and put you back as you were, even if I couldn't fix your blood. With Juu-nii, I was right there when Shunsui-nii stabbed him, so I could heal him right away, before the body had the chance to go through any major changes. But the more time that passes since Mikihara-dono was hurt, the less effective my skills are and the more I'm afraid of hurting him. My power isn't a healing power, it's the power to undo things. If undoing means undoing healing, and if I can't move quickly because of the patient's delicate state, I could cause huge amounts of haemorrhaging by re-opening blood vessels that have already knitted themselves back together, even if that knitting means more limited function or an ugly scar. I've done everything I can for him, but it's not enough for me. Madeki-dono wants me to leave him — but I can't. I feel it's a job half-done, but I can't finish it."

"It's all right, since you began it," Shirogane offered her a smile. "Hyakken's a stubborn man. Quiet, disciplined, focused and duty-minded. He took on Anabomi because it was what he felt he ought to do. Now, somewhere in there I'm sure he knows that Ninth need him more than they need anyone. He'll pull through for them. You've given him the start he needs to go on and heal — I believe that."

"I hope you're right," Shikiki admitted. "I don't know him, but I don't want him to die. He fought very hard, and I know he was protecting other members of his Division. People like that should get another chance."

"But you can't heal his arms?"

"No... they will have to heal on their own, alongside whatever reconstructive work Retsu-sama can do," Shikiki shook her head.

“And Ryuusei-dono?”

“I heard you did some first aid for him, in the Real World?” Shikiki asked, and Shirogane nodded.

“He’s not a close friend, but a respected comrade, and, in some ways, I didn’t want to lose another piece in my projected future Clan puzzle,” he admitted. “As a Clan heir, it’s helpful to know and get along with the people who will inherit your neighbours’ lands. Souja-dono’s death means that District Seven is once more a question... I didn’t need District Five to be added to that equation.”

“Ryuusei-dono will live, but there’s nothing that can be done for his arm,” Shikiki looked regretful. ‘If it was just the torn limb, maybe, but he was bitten badly all over his upper body. The Hollow’s saliva left a lot of bacteria, and it’s become infected. It wasn’t your fault,’ as Shirogane looked stricken. “There was nothing you could’ve done to prevent it, not given the circumstances you were in. Ryuusei-dono will live. He’s stronger than Mikihara-fukutaichou right now, and his heart is standing up to the strain well. Erika-dono is with him, and she’s top notch when it comes to this kind of infection. He’s in very safe hands... but he will heal without his arm.”

“Well, at least it’s his left arm,” Shirogane gazed at his own hands pensively, “though I imagine it will be a blow, when that begins to sink in.”

“Yes, but everyone seems preoccupied with other things right at the moment,” Shikiki paused, then, “Shirogane-nii, you’ll know, and I know you’ll tell me the truth. The Council Meeting this morning — is it true that Juu-nii’s been summoned?”

“Ukitake?” Shirogane looked surprised, then he shrugged.

“I’m not party to all Council information, and you aren’t either,” he warned. “Some things aren’t to be gossip among lower ranks, you know.”

“I know, and I won’t, but Kirio came by here earlier with another message and she told me that Juu-nii was called to see the Council first thing,” Shikiki bit her lip. “She thought I should know, because Juu-nii is family to me. Please, Shirogane-nii. I won’t gossip, I promise. I’ll say nothing — but tell me what you know.”

Shirogane sighed.

“Very little, as it happens,” he admitted. “It seems to be Nagesu-sama’s affair, but it has something to do with data relating to Keitarou’s location and the battle that brought him down. Apparently Nagesu-sama thinks Ukitake knows something or knew something... anyhow, I wouldn't worry. Ukitake has more political lives than a cat, and you're better off keeping out of it, whatever it happens to be."

"Kirio thought it was serious," Shikiki murmured, and Shirogane nodded.

"Whenever the Council call en masse, it's serious," he agreed, "but the truth is, Shikiki, while we were in the Real World, a lot of things happened. Seireitei was invaded. People were killed. And, Nagesu-sama came home to find his cousin's corpse cooling on his Division cobbles and his Senkaimon blown to kingdom come."

"Yes, but Juu-nii wasn't there. He wasn't at Third," Shikiki objected. "He was with Kirio, because she told me so. Whatever it is they think he's done, he didn't do anything. I'm worried about him... and about what this all means."

"If I knew more, I'd tell you," Shirogane told her, "but what I am sure of is that your adoptive brother is no pushover and nor is he the type to be cowed by a few Council bigwigs demanding explanations. I'm sure Ukitake will talk his way out of trouble — or, which I think is more likely — they'll send him back to Thirteenth because he won't stop talking. One or the other."

"I hope you're right," Shikiki sighed, turning her gaze towards her sleeping patient. "Madedi-dono said that the battle is over but the war has begun. Maybe he was right, in more ways than one."

"What do you mean?" Shirogane was startled, and Shikiki shrugged.

"Juu-nii believes in fighting for the things he has faith in, whatever they are and wherever they lead," she said softly. "Because he's like that, people like me are able to be shinigami. There's something in the atmosphere, Shirogane-nii. Whatever it is, it's not just the aftermath of Kei-nii's death, or the bloodshed, or anything else. It's something different."

"Something to do with this chimera people keep talking about?"

"I don't know. Maybe," Shikiki was cautious. "I didn't see it — nobody here did — so I can't be sure. Like I said, it's just a feeling. This is more than just another battle won. It's... the beginning of something else. And I just hope that, if Juu-nii's any part of whatever it is, he knows what he's doing."

Silence hung over the chamber following Midori's questions, an intimidating, choking silence that seemed to thicken the air. Obediently, though not without misgivings, Juushirou did as he was instructed, taking a deep breath into his lungs to steady himself and hoping against hope that the tension and adrenaline suddenly coursing through his body would not cause him to cough.

“I’ll provide whatever I can,” he said gravely, “although I would appreciate it if the Council did not jump to sweeping conclusions before all the evidence has been reviewed. I have not concealed the whereabouts of Aizen Keitarou. If I had had firm proof of where he was before yesterday’s attack, I would have reported it immediately. I had no such proof. All I had was a hunch — a conviction that Shunsui and I both believed likely but unprovable.”

“A hunch that he and his people were hiding in the Spiritless Zone?” Yuuichi eyed him quizzically. “Why there, of all places? What would lead to such a hunch, when Nagesu-sama saw him in the Real World in person?”

“That exact thing,” Juushirou said earnestly. “Both Shunsui and I know Keitarou of old, Yuuichi-sama. We know that his forte is showing himself in places he has no intention of staying.”

“So you guessed?” Midori looked sceptical. “And this random, lucky guess somehow had my younger brother disappearing off there to arrest Endou Eiraki and bring her into Second Division custody? Kai isn’t talking about why he went, and given the result, I’m not planning on disciplining him — but I find it hard to believe that Eiraki’s arrest was a complete fluke of luck. I know you and Shunsui met with Kai and I’m sure that he went because you asked him to. He isn’t telling me why — but I’d like it if you did, now the event is over.”

“Shunsui and I knew that Keitarou was sheltering Rukongai vagrants,” Juushirou said frankly. “He couldn’t take those to the Real World, and couldn’t leave them in the wasteland Rukon, because they’d starve. The only viable place to take them was the Spiritless Zone, and all the information we had pointed to that as a high likelihood... as well as the risk of him using it as a launchpad to attack us here. The Onmitsukidou were the best placed team to tackle that kind of an investigation, so we spoke to Kai accordingly. It wasn’t a random guess, but a process of elimination.”

“Which you failed to mention to a senior officer,” Yuuichi remarked.

“With respect, Yuuichi-sama, I spoke to Nagesu-sama directly about my concerns relating to people in Rukongai, and my hesitations about the Real World mission,” Juushirou replied quietly. “I was told that they were unfounded. It’s not as though I have any political influence or authority of my own to prevent a trip to the Real World voted on and acted upon by members of the Council. All I could do was prepare for the worst and hope for the best.”

“You didn’t mention any of this to me, Juushirou,” now Hirata spoke, and Juushirou turned, meeting his friend’s pale gaze. “Why would you cut me out of it? If you had information, you could’ve come to me. I would’ve listened — as I would think you’d know by this point.”

Juushirou was silent for a moment. Then, slowly, he nodded.

“I know,” he admitted. “I’m sorry, Hirata. I did cut you out and it was my fault, not Shunsui’s. What we discussed and the reasons we discussed them... I was worried about the pressure it would put on you and how it would make you feel. You’d lost your son, and you had lots of burdens around Seventh, with Tenichi’s arrest and Ohara’s incapacitation. I didn’t want to add more to the pile.”

“And that was the only reason?” Hirata’s gaze bored into Juushirou, who frowned, shrugging his shoulders.

“One more reason,” he owned, “but I’ll come to it in a little while, if I may. You might be cross with me, but I feel as though there’s a lot to say and I’ve barely begun scratching the surface.”

Hirata’s eyes narrowed slightly behind his glasses, but he made no reply, and Juushirou took a deep breath into his lungs. He fumbled at his obi, pulling out the sheets of paper written by Izumi and Ketsui, and approaching Hirata’s position, held them out.

“You should see these, too,” he murmured, and Hirata’s brows creased, but he took them, glancing them over.

“I don’t understand,” he admitted. “I can’t read any of this. Why are you giving me scientific papers, when they should surely go to...”

He paused, trailing off as realisation dawned in his eyes, and Juushirou saw the consternation that flickered across his expression. He folded the sheets absently, glancing at Juushirou questioningly.

“These are from where I think they are?”

“They are,” Juushirou nodded.

“And whatever is contained in here is part of why you didn’t report in full detail before the Council about your suspicions relating to Keitarou?”

“In part, yes,” Juushirou nodded again. “I couldn’t do that without your permission.”

“Hirata, what did Juushirou give you?” Midori’s eyes were glittering with curiosity, and Hirata sighed, handing the papers back to his friend.

“Give them to Nagesu-sama,” he said wearily. “They should be with him.”

Juushirou bowed his head, retrieving the sheets and padding across the chamber to where Nagesu sat in the chair reserved for the current Head of the Council.

Nagesu took the sheets, glancing at them, and his eyebrows shot up. He stared at Juushirou incredulously.

“Where did you get this?”

“From the same place as the last lot of data relating to Keitarou’s base in the Rukon territory,” Juushirou said simply. “An anonymous source, whose information seemed to be reliable.”

“Anonymous source?” Kyouki’s eyes became slits. “Juushirou, I don’t think we’re at a point where ‘anonymous’ anything is appropriate. We need to know the full truth of this matter — including all resources and whether those resources might have saved the lives of officers cut down both in yesterday’s events and the Real World. I’m sure you’re fully aware of the injuries suffered by the Fifth and we are all reeling from the murders at Ninth... these are serious situations, and if you had a source working on something so specific, why didn’t you bring the evidence forward sooner?”

“Because my source might have been in danger of her life,” Juushirou replied quietly. “I wasn’t about to barter her safety on something I couldn’t conclusively prove was correct.”

“Her life?” Nagesu’s brows knitted together in confusion. “This came from a girl?”

“You don’t need to sound so stunned, Nagesu-sama,” Midori interjected. “There are many women capable of the same skills as men, or better, as you should well know. Otherwise why do you trust in Sekime Mareiko’s work as much as you do?”

“That wasn’t my intention,” Nagesu looked startled, then abashed, shaking his head. “I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to give that impression. I had thought that Ukitake must have uncovered some work of Keitarou’s own, but I can’t imagine... Eiraki-hime is no scientist, and this level of calculation... she could not have understood..."

"The source is not affiliated with Aizen Keitarou, but has been victimised by him," Juushirou said simply. "Members of her family were attacked and murdered by him. I am not at liberty to divulge any further information. Doing so would be in breach of the promise I made to protect her, and I already made it clear that I will not put her life in danger, not even to satisfy Clan curiosity."

"And you know something about this, Hirata-dono?" Retsu asked softly. Hirata nodded.

"Juushirou is withholding information on my request," he replied evenly. "The individuals in question are under my protection and their identities and whereabouts have been a strict secret for a very long time. I will vouch for Juushirou's judgement in this matter. If he held back information from you, Nagesu-sama, it is because my father and I impressed on him the need to keep that secret, no matter what. Especially, I'm afraid, from you."

"I don't understand," Nagesu looked bewildered. "If someone had such scientific evidence, and these abilities, why would it be inappropriate for her to meet with me? I will accept that, in this regard, Ukitake is not at fault, not if he was ordered to act in a certain way by a Council member, but even so, it seems high-handed."

"So is the fact that the Urahara Clan have not rescinded their persecution laws against certain individuals, even though all those who committed the alleged offences are long since dead." Hirata said flatly, and Nagesu's eyes widened with horror.

"Then these are...?"

"Descendants of families your father's laws decided would be better off dead," Hirata spoke bluntly. "A lot of families fled to District Seven following Keitsune-sama's downfall, and not all of them were in league with Keitarou's rebels. Some became trusted agents of my family, thanks to my father's foresight in protecting them from harm during my Grandfather and my cousin's eras. Ojiisama and Seimaru never discovered them, and when Juushirou came to Seventh, he encountered them — but he has always treated that information with the ultimate discretion. Neither father nor I wanted any kind of altercation with the Urahara when District Seven was in so much turmoil of its own, and so we kept their existence a secret. My son also knew this secret, and it was upon their information that he apparently travelled to Rukongai in the first place."

"Where he was attacked?" Kyouki asked softly, and Hirata's eyes flickered with something unreadable. He nodded.

“Souja went to Rukongai to investigate a scientific lead put to him by the same people that Juushirou received his information from,” he said quietly. “Those who provided it were trusted friends of my son, and wanted to avenge his death as much as did I. I didn’t know till now that they were continuing to act in such a way — but I have seen ample evidence of their recent activities to realise that they have made an important difference. My son’s death was a senseless waste and a personal tragedy, but the information he brought back allowed us to know that Keitarou had returned, and that was thanks to the agents working in the shadows on our behalf. The children of sinners aren’t sinners, Nagesu-sama — but these individuals have nobody else to speak for them but me and those I trust. More, Souja wouldn’t forgive me if I let harm befall them because of his rash judgement in going to Rukongai without consulting me first, and so even if you demand to know their names and whereabouts, until we have assurance they will not be persecuted, I will not answer and nor will Juushirou.”

“I have never sought to persecute the descendents of people my father believed guilty of treason,” Nagesu looked weary. “I had no idea that such a situation persisted, and I will address it if it is in my power to do so. We shall hold further discussion on this, Hirata-dono, in a more private location. I have no wish to hurt innocents for crimes they did not commit, especially if they are capable of such intricate and intelligent work.”

He set the paper aside.

“With your permission, Ukitake, I should like to keep this and examine it in more detail. Just by glancing at it I can see the scientific theories applied and I understand your reservations about the Real World trip and the reasons you were afraid of a Seireitei attack. I am sorry that Clan issues dogged your ability to communicate those concerns. If you had been able to be more frank with me, I would have taken your worries more seriously, but I see now that that was beyond both of our control and, once again, rooted in the decisions of dead men. In deference to Hirata-dono’s words, I won’t ask any more questions now about how you came by this information. I feel to blame for those issues, even though I had no knowledge that such people even still existed.”

“They are good people, Nagesu-sama, and their contributions have saved lives,” Juushirou said earnestly. “It’s not my business to interfere, but I sincerely hope that a settlement can be reached so that they are no longer hunted and forced into hiding.”

“Well, so if this magic document of Juushirou’s clears up the questions about what information was available, and why that information was withheld, what about the matter of the Rukongai strays?” Tokutarou looked thoughtful. “A scientific survey surely didn’t involve illicit trips to Rukongai as well?”

“No, sir. It did not,” Juushirou shook his head. “The study was conducted within Seireitei, based on existing records held here and with the knowledge of the people concerned. Records which came, largely, from Sekime-taichou, on Nagesu-sama’s request, I believe.”

“Indeed,” Nagesu’s lips thinned. “I did ask her if she would talk to you about your source... it seems she did more than that, but I can’t fault her judgement, given the result.”

“Then we return to the question of why the Spiritless Zone, and why the belief there were people in Rukongai who weren’t in the Spiritless Zone,” Tokutarou pressed. “You seem to have found this important, and so I think we should consider it so, too. Where did that tip come from? If not Hirata-dono’s hidden helpers, then who?”

Juushirou bit his lip, hesitating for a moment. Then he sighed, nodding his head.

“I came here today to disclose that,” he admitted. “The current situation on the other side of the Sekkiseki wall can’t persist, so I intended to come tell the truth as best I can. I am fearful of doing so, not for myself, but for the witness in question. Hirata is protecting the people who produced the scientific data, but I am all this witness has in the way of protection, and I don’t have the same reach of influence. What I say now might cost an innocent man his life, but nor can I continue to conceal it and hope nobody sees. I have to put my trust in the Council’s justice.”

“That was awfully melodramatic, Juushirou-kun,” Kyouki rubbed her chin. “And, if I may say, most unlike you. You’ve never shied away from giving full testimony before. Why now?”

“Because the person who told me about the Rukongai strays came from Rukongai himself,” Juushirou said sadly. “He broke the law, though he didn’t do it with intent... quite the opposite. He came here attempting to save the life of another, only he didn’t succeed.”

“Souja!” Hirata’s eyes widened in dismay, and Juushirou nodded.

“Yes.”

“He didn’t find Souja in Seireitei, but came back with him, from Rukongai?” Kyouki asked thoughtfully. “Then he must have seen something important, relating to the attack?”

“He confirmed Souja’s own words,” Juushirou agreed, “Souja was attacked by the girl, Sakaki, with a dead blade. He disturbed the confrontation, and she fled. He brought Souja back on Souja’s request. Souja’s sword opened the Senkaimon, and Koku came back with him. He was subsequently injured, and has been in the custody of Thirteenth Division since, under the care of Edogawa Mitsuki.”

Retsu inclined her head in confirmation of this last point, but there was no surprise in her gentle gaze, and Juushirou’s eyes narrowed slightly as he wondered what the Fourth Division Captain knew and why she had so willingly allowed Mitsuki to return to Thirteenth with so few questions in the middle of a pitched battle. Had she realised the truth? The healer said nothing, however, and the moment was gone as soon as it had come.

“So the stray you’ve been treating at Thirteenth Division was one of the Rukongai vagrants?” Guren mused. “I suppose that makes some sense. And why you’d protect him — but surely you don’t think the Council would punish the boy in circumstances like this?”

His gaze flitted to Hirata, then,

“Thanks to that boy, Hirata-dono at least was able to speak to his son before his death,” he added regretfully. “I wish I had had that opportunity with Ribari before he was ripped away from me. This stray acted to save a life, and brought a valued officer home to those who cared about him. Nobody would take his life for that. On the contrary, he’s to be commended for taking the risk. The Council is capable of mercy in situations such as this, and I don’t suppose any of us would vote to kill him based on what you’ve said. We already know that Souja-dono’s sword opened the Gate, and so, effectively, Souja-dono brought the Rukon boy back with him.”

“Given the severity of his wounds, Souja-dono wouldn’t have made it back without help,” Retsu spoke softly now, and Nagesu’s gaze flitted to her in consternation.

“Retsu-sama? You knew this boy was from Rukongai?”

“I admit, I did,” Retsu offered a smile that, to Juushirou, looked anything but apologetic. ‘I don’t believe in killing children who have acted in kindness, even if they’ve broken rules to do it. The boy was Souja-dono’s rescuer. Because of him, Souja-dono was able to return here. Ukitake-taichou,’ this last to Juushirou, “I am sorry I didn’t raise it with you sooner, but it was clear from the moment I saw Souja-dono's condition that he didn't return here alone. Also, that whoever saved him had reiatsu — because I found traces of it all over Souja-dono, evidence that this boy had more or less carried Souja-dono through the gate. He wasn't an ordinary Plus soul, and therefore he didn't come from the Spiritless Zone. Given all of these factors, I couldn't risk having him brought to Fourth and treated officially, in case the truth was discovered and he was put in danger. That's why I trusted it to Mitsuki, and to you."

"But we wouldn't kill a boy who broke rules helping one of ours," Kyouki objected. "Souja-dono was a Clan heir and a fine Vice Captain. I think we can trust his judgement in trusting this stray. If that's the only reason you kept the information back, Juushirou, you overreacted. It's like Guren-sama said — we're not merciless monsters. We can judge based on individual circumstances, and these were clearly exceptional."

"It's a bit more complicated than that," aware that Hirata's hawkish eyes were now fixed on him, Juushirou avoided his friend's gaze, turning back towards the other members of the Council with a troubled look on his face. "He did come here with the intention of helping Souja-dono, but he isn't a Rukongai stray. At least, not in the way you're imagining."

There was a pause silent enough to hear the sound of a pin dropping, then,

"He's Keitarou's missing son. Kohaku."

"Aizen Kohaku?" Immediately there was uproar, and Nagesu was on his feet, a stricken expression crossing his features. "Ukitake, are you saying you've been shielding the son of my cousin — an outlaw — a man under orders of death? Do you understand the ramifications for such a thing? Do you know the amount of danger you could have put everyone in by shielding such a man?"

"All reports we have suggest Kohaku is highly dangerous," Yuuichi agreed. "You should have brought him here with you, Ukitake... left alone at Thirteenth, who knows what damage he could be doing?"

"We might just have eradicated the father, when suddenly we're dealing with the son," Midori added bleakly. "Did Kai know about this, Juushirou? Is that the reason he won't talk to me about his mission to Rukongai?"

"He should be arrested at once," Guren decided. "Ukitake, this is a serious issue. Even if you lack Clan authority, you should know that...”

“With all due respect, Guren-sama, I’m not going to hand over Kohaku to the Council,” Juushirou cut across the Kuchiki Clan leader, his eyes apprehensive but his words firm. “I didn’t come here today to do that. Without Kohaku yesterday, more of us would’ve been dead. Without his actions, his foresight, and his decision to help us, the battle might not have been won. That boy sacrificed everything to bring an end to this conflict, and I won’t see that gamble betrayed.”

“What do you mean, sacrificed everything?” Kyouki demanded, and Juushirou offered her a grim smile.

“Kohaku is the only one who could undo Keitarou’s control, other than Keitarou himself,” he said matter-of-factly. “All those who were possessed, yesterday, were freed by Kohaku’s power. Including your son, Kyouki-sama. Hakubei-dono was one of Keitarou’s puppets... because of Kohaku, he’s now safe.”

“And Ohara?” Hirata demanded, as Kyouki’s eyes widened, and Juushirou felt a suppressed whip of air sweep around the chamber as his friend fought to keep a hand on his rising emotions. “Juushirou, you mean the chimera, don’t you? The hallucination we all saw in Seireitei — that was Kohaku’s power?”

“It was,” Juushirou confirmed. “Kohaku’s power has been described as the power of prophesy, but he can make people see the past, the present and the future. He’s a very powerful young boy, but he isn’t like his father. He can be trusted. He’s on our side.”

“Or he’s waiting until we believe in him before he stabs us all in the back,” Yuuichi interjected sceptically. “I haven’t heard anything about any chimera, but I would wager it was a trick.”

“I don’t know what it was,” Hirata admitted. “But I saw it all and in vivid colours. I believe Juushirou, Yuuichi-dono. I think I saw a similar thing cure J... one of my other men, though he refused to give me all the information about how he had been freed. If I’m right...”

His gaze darted towards Juushirou’s quizzically, and Juushirou inclined his head.

“Yes, he did,” he agreed cryptically. “The man in question spoke to me after the event. He chose not to speak to you, because he knew about the Kill on Sight order and he didn’t want Kohaku to be hurt. He realised that Kohaku wasn’t acting as an enemy acts — and so he wanted to keep him safe.”

“To the extent that he lied to my face, twice,” Hirata’s lips twitched in displeasure, and Juushirou offered a wan smile.

“I’m sorry,” he admitted, “but I imagine he did so for the same reason Shunsui and I kept this from you. We didn’t know how you would react. You didn’t have the girl, Sakaki, to take out your feelings on, nor did you have Keitarou in your sights. I didn’t want Kohaku to become a victim, and I didn’t want to put you in a situation like that. I’m sure your man felt the same way.”

“In short, you, Shunsui and my subordinate didn’t trust me to manage the Wind Hawk and react sensibly to the presence of my sister’s son in your midst, even if he was the one who brought Souja home,” Hirata gazed at his hands for a moment, then he sighed, nodding his head. “I don’t know. Maybe you’re right. I can’t guarantee how I might have felt, before yesterday... before facing Anabomi.”

“But none of this proves this Kohaku is an innocent party,” Yuuichi persisted, “or that the rescue of Endou Souja wasn’t some kind of a trap... even a conspiracy designed to win our trust. Plus, the circumstances leading up to the death of Anabomi still have to be fully investigated. Even more so if one of Keitarou’s children was at such close quarters — aiding and abetting his father, most probably. We decided on outlawing the offspring for a reason, Ukitake. Even more so, if he’s making Captains conceal important information from one another. Like father, like son.”

“It’s a pity you’re not more like your father, Yuuichi-dono,” A fresh voice cut through the discussion at that juncture, and Juushirou started, swinging around to see the door of the chamber suddenly open, a familiar figure silhouetted in its frame. Shunsui sauntered forwards, the casual pink haori still cast over his shoulders with no attempt at formality, and at the sight of him, Tokutarou’s brows knitted together in annoyance.

“Shunsui, the Council are done with you. You were dismissed, and this is nothing to do with you,” he began, but Shunsui snorted, shaking his head.

“With respect, Nii-sama, you don’t know what you’re talking about,” he said frankly, and Juushirou stared at his friend in disbelief. “Before you scold me, yes, I was eavesdropping, but that’s because you dismissed me without listening to everything I had to say. This is to do with Kohaku, and Juushirou isn’t the only one who’s been protecting him. I have been, too — albeit until yesterday, I still had my reservations about it.”

“What is this, a Gotei-wide conspiracy?” Guren demanded, as Tokutarou buried his head in his hands in frustration, and Shunsui shrugged his shoulders.

“The person most hurting in Seireitei right now is Kohaku,” he said quietly. “There’s something that you need to know, though. Something regarding which even Juushirou might not know all the details. Yesterday, I killed Aizen Keitarou. I think everyone knows that. What they don’t know is that, without Kohaku, I wouldn’t have been able to do it. Without that boy’s intervention, we might all now be dead.”

“That’s ridiculous,” Yuuichi snorted. “Keitarou was one man, and even if First wasn’t on site, with the rest of the Gotei deployed and people returning from the Real World...”

“Keitarou was banking on them returning from the Real World,” Shunsui’s eyes had become flinty and cold, and despite himself, Juushirou stifled a shiver at their expression. “That was part of his plan. He wanted us separated, not because he thought Seireitei would be easier to attack in the absence of most of its Council Captains, but because he thought those Council Captains might make useful weapons, later on in the game.”

“What are you...” Midori faltered, and Shunsui offered her a hollow smile.

“Keitarou was going to Third Division to wait for you to return through the Gate,” he said quietly. “That’s why I killed him there. He wanted you to come back, battle-weary and off-guard, and he was going to use Chudokuga to possess you. Whether he would’ve managed to snare you or not, I don’t know — but from the battle reports in the Real World, I imagine you weren’t any of you at full throttle. He left those monsters there to wear you out, so you’d be easier for him to manipulate when you came home. He wanted to use you to kill the rest of us. Those who had survived the initial round, which was only the tip of the iceberg. All of these things he more or less confirmed to me, during our fight, so I have no doubt in their truth.”

“Shunsui...” Juushirou’s eyes rounded with horror, but Shunsui continued, not acknowledging his friend’s words.

“The day before yesterday, Kohaku asked to speak to me,” he continued. “He showed me what he had seen, in a way similar to what he did across all of Seireitei, though on a much more minor scale. He impressed on me the reality of the situation. He told me that I was the only one capable of stopping Keitarou, because my sword could not be controlled by Keitarou's skill, a fact which Keitarou himself more or less acknowledged during our fight. He told me where Keitarou was going, why he was going there, and what he intended to do. He asked me to stop Keitarou from killing anyone else, and he knew, when he asked me, that it meant killing his father. I can only imagine what the boy is feeling now... but he chose to act to protect Seireitei. I believe in his integrity. And, more than that, I believe we're here to talk about his integrity because he chose to sacrifice something dear to him, instead of the things dear to all of us."

"It could still be a trap," Nagesu murmured, and Juushirou shook his head.

"It's not a trap," he said firmly. "Nagesu-sama, you said yourself that you don't believe in punishing an innocent for sins that weren't theirs. This is that exact thing. There's no evidence of Kohaku committing any crime at all, bar crossing into Seireitei to bring Souja home. Killing him would be murder. And it would be an act founded in fear, not justice."

"Also, if the Council really feels like storming the Thirteenth for him, they'll have to get through the Eighth as well," Shunsui interjected lazily. 'I didn't cut apart my own moral beliefs yesterday to see Juushirou or his pet stray punished for saving Seireitei, so if you decide to invade Thirteenth to take him by force, I'll be deploying some of my officers — including my Vice Captain,' this last with a pointed glance at the stricken Kyouki, "to protect Thirteenth's perimeter, just to even the score."

"Shunsui!" Tokutarou exclaimed, clearly angry now, but Kyouki shook her head, holding up her hands.

"No, Tokkun, wait," she said slowly. "If what Juushirou said is correct, then we're discussing slaughtering a young man who gave me back my son and prevented him and my daughter from hurting each other. If that's true, then I want no part of harming him. Whoever's child he is."

"He's also the person who brought Souja back," Hirata said quietly, and Juushirou gazed at his friend, relieved to see that it really wasn't feral anger, but genuine emotion that glistened as tears behind the wire-rimmed glasses. "It's more than just being in the right place at the right time, and now, I'm starting to understand everything much more clearly than I did before. If Kohaku had hurt Souja, Souja wouldn't have begged me to protect the lad. More than his own life, more than his need to report to me, Souja was concerned about Koku's safety. Souja knew something about Kohaku that meant he was worried about the boy's safety. My son was smart, and his judgement of people was sound... but the fervent way in which he pleaded with Juushirou and I to protect the lad suggested he knew something more about him — something he either chose not to tell us, or decided he couldn't."

He glanced at Juushirou.

"We discussed, once, the possibility that someone saw my son's death before it happened, and wrote a prophesy about it. That was Kohaku, wasn't it?"

"Yes," Juushirou nodded solemnly. "Yes, it was."

"Then he saw the incident, and actively tried to stop it, didn't he?"

"He did," Juushirou agreed. "He waited to warn Souja, but he wasn't able to convince him to turn back, and lacked the skill to follow him at the speed Souja could move. By the time he reached the scene, Souja was already hurt. Kohaku chased away his sister, but it was too late for him to do anything but help Souja come home. Even now, he considers himself to blame because he failed, even though it wasn't his fault. Kohaku said he spoke to Souja first at the hut, where Keitarou used to confine him, and tried to persuade him to return to Seireitei. Souja wouldn't go. I don't know exactly what else was said during that conversation, but Kohaku did say that Souja knew he was connected to Keitarou based on that brief meeting. Despite that, Souja decided to protect him. Even from you and I, Hirata, by choosing not to tell us the truth. He didn't see Kohaku as his enemy — and I agree with you. He's not someone who could be easily fooled. Knowing those things, he still judged Kohaku as his ally — and on his deathbed, ensured his protection. I've acted on his request ever since, although I've only known Kohaku's real identity since very recently. Since... since his brother Katsura assaulted the Seventh Division."

"A suspect who is still at large," Guren pointed out.

"Yes, but we can't punish Kohaku for the crimes of which we know Katsura is guilty," Shunsui pointed out. "One brother is not as good as another. If and when Katsura is found, he'll have to face justice for what he did and nobody will stand against that. He murdered innocent people and that can't be ignored. Kohaku, however..."

He shook his head.

"In the brief moment in which Kohaku impressed on me his vision and his request, I think I understood the battle he'd been fighting inside of himself," he said softly. "The fight between his loyalty to those he loved and his desire to do what was right. I think he tried to not do anything, and hoped it would all go away. I've felt that way, too, in the past — but I've learned you can't take that line, because things only get worse. I think Kohaku realised it too, and probably, that's why he came to me. He knew I could kill Keitarou where he couldn't... and put things right."

"At the very least, perhaps the Council ought to hear this boy's words for themselves," Retsu offered her suggestion, and at the calmness in her words, Juushirou suddenly had the uncanny sensation that the healer's silent deductions had gone far beyond simply placing Kohaku in Rukongai. "I was never happy with the Kill on Sight order, and I requested then that if any of Keitarou's children should be detained, we should evaluate that circumstance appropriately. Now, that seems prudent."

"Retsu-sama is right," Tokutarou admitted. "Unforgivably rude as my brother has been, we can't uphold a Kill on Sight order when there are so many variables in play. We don't know anything about this Kohaku, and we ought to assess his guilt or innocence directly, and hear what he has to say for himself about what happened here yesterday."

"I think the Council should speak to him too," Juushirou rallied his courage, meeting the gaze of his friend's brother head on as he remembered the promises he had made to himself that morning before leaving Thirteenth's barracks. "But with all respect, Tokutarou-sama, yesterday's battle was won here in Seireitei, largely in the absence of the Council of Elders. Hirata aside, it was the other Divisions — those without Council authority — who worked together to protect Inner Seireitei under highly dangerous circumstances. Because of that fact, Anabomi is dead, as are several good officers, and Mikiyama Hyakken is still fighting for his life in the care of the Fourth. Despite that, we won. Protecting Kohaku was a part of why we prevailed. Without him, Hakubei-dono, Sekime-taichou and Souryou-kun would probably not have been saved and more people might've been hurt. Without him, Keitarou might still be alive. Without him, we might all have fallen foul of Keitarou's scheme. Those of us left behind acted independently because the Council, despite receiving warnings about the risks of going to the Real World, fell into Keitarou's trap and jeopardised the lives of everyone here and everyone there. If Kohaku's role must be 'assessed' for guilt, perhaps the Council of Elders should be so assessed, too — as I think the deaths of the Ninth Division officers are less on his conscience than on your own."

"Juu..." Shunsui let out a low whistle at the tone of Juushirou's words, but Nagesu sighed, removing his spectacles and rubbing his brow as though trying to remove a sudden headache.

“Ukitake is right,” he says heavily. “We can jump to all the conclusions we like about this son of Keitarou, but so far, the only crime we can pin against his name is having an unsavoury father. Keitarou is my cousin. I am also tainted by a blood connection to this man, yet I hope you won’t adjudge me a traitor because of it.”

“Ukitake is rude,” Midori cast Juushirou a pensive glance. “I’ve never heard you be quite that directly offensive towards us before, Juushirou — you care that much about this boy’s safety that you’d risk our wrath to protect him?”

“Kohaku made the choices he did because he didn’t want me to die,” Juushirou said sadly. “He chose, actively, not to let me die. How can I let him die in return? He didn’t think he’d survive yesterday, he gave everything he had to project his illusion across Inner Seireitei and break Keitarou’s spell. One of Eighth Division found him collapsed in the middle of the street and he had to be carried back to safety, but even then he still was concerned about the Senkaimon, and about people coming back and being at risk.”

“The Senkaimon that Shunsui broke?” Kyouki’s eyes became slits, and Shunsui looked rueful.

“Well, Kohaku might have helped,” he admitted. ‘I only added the final touches. Really, it was a mangled mess by the time I got to it — Kohaku destroyed it so you couldn’t come back and walk into Keitarou’s trap. But I will still pay for it, Nagesu-sama,’ he added, turning to the Third Division Captain. “Kohaku told me his spirit power was Kyouraku in nature, so it seems only fair that I do.”

“Paying for that is the last of my worries right now,” Nagesu said grimly. “The deaths of Anabomi Seizuku, the events at Ninth, the invasion and everything else we discovered in the Real World is a much bigger concern. We need the truth, even when sometimes it is hard to hear, and bit by bit, we will have it.”

He glanced around at his companions.

“A vote on whether to stay the Kill on Sight order pertaining to Aizen Kohaku?” he asked. “Are there any objections?”

Juushirou held his breath, but the room held its silence, and Nagesu nodded.

“Then by decree of the Council, the Kill on Sight order is so rescinded,” he said wearily. “Ukitake, your manner of phrasing was not the best, but your words held truth and I take particular responsibility for that fact. We will speak to the boy — we must — but unless any new evidence comes to light suggesting his complicity, we will not pursue further charges, nor will we persecute him for coming from Rukongai. Inner Seireitei is indebted to the actions of those left behind, and will honour the lives of those lost in the fight. There are many witnesses we need to speak to. Kohaku will be one of them, but for the time being, he belongs to Thirteenth and that is where he should stay.”

“And for being rude?” Juushirou looked apprehensive, and despite herself, Kyouki chuckled.

“This time, you get away with it, since Shunsui was ruder first,” she said amiably. “It takes courage to face up to Clan leaders and speak your mind. I trust this boy is worth your conviction... I look forward to having the chance to meet him, and thank him in person for helping to save my son.”

Author’s Note: Shikiki’s Power

So I know Orihime can reverse pretty much anything after pretty much any amount of time, but this didn’t suit me. It seemed plotkai to think that Shikiki would have the power to magically fix everyone immediately after such a fierce round of fighting. I gave her limits, first, way back when she was eight years old and she couldn’t bring Daisuke back from the dead. I added to it when she could only heal Juushirou because his spirit was still there. Then Shirogane’s bleeding — she could stop it ,but she couldn’t replace the blood. And now, as her experience evolves, so do the parameters I’ve put on her abilities.

Shikiki is not a healer, she is someone who can reverse things. Orihime, by contrast, rejects their ever having happened. In this respect, Shikiki is different from Orihime, and I wanted her to be. Shikiki has always utilised her spirit power around reishi and she has only been able to heal people providing the parts she needs of them are there to heal with. In Shikiki’s case, then, healing someone like Hyakken whose arm wounds have begun to heal could be counter-productive... and reconstituting a missing arm that was eaten in the Real World some time earlier somewhat beyond her capabilities.

So, perhaps this isn’t true to the kind of power Orihime has. But it’s the kind of power Shikiki has, and honestly, one I’m more comfortable writing.

73. The Shadows Of Death

Chapter Seventy One: The Shadows Of Death

“I don’t think I’ve ever been so rude to the Council of Elders,” Juushirou sank down onto his cushions beside the window of Ugendou with a rueful sigh.

“At least, not all of them, and not all at once. I almost wonder how I had the courage... but with everything you said, I didn’t think I could make it much worse.”

“You shocked even me,” Shunsui lounged against the window, setting a ceramic bottle on the ledge between them. “But it seems to have done the trick. I didn’t think you had it in you to give them hell — at least, not to their faces. I was impressed, Juu... and so I wasn’t going to let you fight the battle alone.”

He grinned, but Juushirou could see the shadows still lurking in his friend’s eyes.

“I’ve corrupted you more than I thought,” he reflected. “Maybe I should be proud of that fact... our long acquaintance has impacted on you as much as it has on me.”

“Mm,” Juushirou reached a hand over to pick up the ceramic vessel, turning it so that he could see the stamp. His eyes widened.

“Vintage Kyouraku sake? This is from your cellar... and I don’t mean the stuff you usually crack open when you come to Thirteenth to visit. What’s the occasion, or are you hoping that, if you get me drunk, I might forget to ask you all the awkward questions that we haven’t yet discussed?”

“The occasion is that I need something strong to drink and I don’t feel like drinking it alone,” Shunsui admitted, taking the bottle and glancing at it, before settling himself down on the floor opposite his friend. “Sora’s thrown me out of the Division for the day, and with good cause. I’m not fit to be there, so she gave me this and sent me on my way. She thought I’d come to you eventually — though I don’t suppose she saw my impromptu appearance in your hearing as part of my itinerary.”

“She threw you out?” Juushirou blinked, and Shunsui nodded.

“She said I needed to work out things for myself and not try and hide from it by burying my head in unimportant Division minutiae,” he said resignedly. “Besides, she had some things to go over of her own with Kanshi and Kikyue. Hirata assigned them to oversee the investigation at Ninth, and so they’re doing their best to puzzle through all of the details. I’m not a part of that, and apparently, nor am I wanted on site. Most of the Division is still far, far away, thanks to my overly cautious deployments, so it’s not as though there’s a lot to supervise.”

“And Shizuka?” Juushirou asked, setting two fresh sakazuki down between them, and Shunsui frowned.

“I have to be the mean Captain and discipline her properly, too,” he admitted. “It terrified me, Juu, when I realised she had disobeyed me and stayed behind. Thank you for keeping her at Thirteenth. If she’d run into the battle, Keitarou would’ve used her against me and I couldn’t have done what I had to do with her there. I couldn’t have hurt another person I cared about because of that man’s sword... so I’m grateful. To the boy too, actually... since she tripped over his legs.”

“Well, I have a full squad on site and we’ve been tied up with helping at Eleventh and Twelfth, so having Shizuka to help has been a positive. It’s no problem,” Juushirou assured his friend. “She and Ketsui train together all the time anyway, and she slots in as an honorary member because she’s here so much as she is. Besides, she did find Koku and she did help him, so it all worked out well in the end. Don’t be too hard on her, Shunsui. She was worried about you because of how much she cares about you... and you know that she’s just following the examples she’s been set.”

“Meaning I’m a lousy role model?” Shunsui demanded, and Juushirou shrugged.

“Better she didn’t see what happened at Third, even though she knows what did,” he said matter-of-factly. “We can dance around it all evening, but it’s not something you can brush off and avoid. Sora threw you out because she knew it would take you time to get your head around it. If a bottle of good sake and my company can help you do that, then I’m all ears. Besides, I think you owe me some explanation... in particular, for not telling me yourself the things Koku admitted after Keitarou was dead.”

Shunsui pursed his lips, and for a moment there was silence, as the older man scooped up the sake bottle, pouring the clear liquid carefully into the two sakazuki. His hand trembled slightly, and Juushirou was too perceptive not to notice it, but he made no comment, simply waiting for his companion to compose his feelings.

At length, Shunsui sighed.

"I know," he agreed reluctantly. "I thought you might be cross with me... and that you'd want an explanation. I'm just not quite sure how to give it. This morning, when I saw you outside the Council, I waited for you. I wanted to see if you still spoke to me... or if my shedding blood behind your back would change our friendship."

"Why would it do that?" Juushirou scooped up his sakazuki, casting his companion a look of surprise. "I don't say I want you to go out there and slit throats for fun, but this was different. It was the necessary removal of a very dangerous man and taking his life will undoubtedly have saved countless others. You did your job, Shunsui — why would I hold that against you?"

"Because I remember, just as I'm sure you do, that when Sensei first told me Katen Kyoukotsu might be able to bring down Keitarou, you said you'd not leave me to do that alone," Shunsui said gravely. "But I consciously made the decision to shut you out of it. I never told you what Koku had asked of me, and I acted on it, without sending to Thirteenth at all."

"That part of it did bother me, some," Juushirou admitted. "Koku explained a little, but he was incoherent, and I don't suppose I fully understand everything he tried to say. I know that protecting me was a part of it — though I'm sure I've told you that I don't need your protection. Especially not now, when I'm a Captain in my own right."

"You don't need my protection," Shunsui agreed, "and Keitarou, he wouldn't have killed you. Not this time. I know that being in Seventh District taught you a lot about defending your own life, and even if you never killed anyone with that sword, you wouldn't have hesitated if Keitarou had posed you a threat. It wasn't that."

"Then what you told the Council? About him controlling others and using them to decimate Inner Seireitei?"

"Koku showed me that future," Shunsui lifted his sakazuki, draining it in one gulp. "He showed me you, dead and bloody on the cobbles of the Thirteenth. If the other Captains had come back through the Senkaimon, Keitarou was going to use them. It wasn't just the image, Juu. In that split-second, it was like I saw it through Keitarou's eyes, not Koku's, and I felt the intent and the spite behind it. He was going to make sure every single member of Thirteenth was dead, but his key target was you. It wouldn't have mattered if you had been in the fight with Keitarou, because he alone had no way to kill you. But his puppets, they could. And fighting an ally — doing what Hirata had to do — that's not something you could do without a moment's thought."

"You'd be surprised," Juushirou's eyes darkened, and he shook his head. "I wouldn't relish it, Shunsui, but if an ally was in the position Anabomi was, I wouldn't hold back. I saw the illusion Kohaku made us all see. I saw how Sakanoue suffered, and I know that, in Minaichi's position, I would've done the same as he did. I wouldn't have needed time to think. If there was no way to save them, I would've put them out of their misery. Just like you put me out of mine, all those years ago. You suffered for that, but I sometimes think that, if our roles had been reversed, I would've suffered less for making the same choice."

"Oh, so you'd have happily killed me and walked away?" Shunsui arched an eyebrow. "Thanks. And I thought we were friends."

"No, silly," Juushirou shook his head, a wry smile touching his lips. He took a sip of sake, setting the sakazuki aside. "I wouldn't have liked it, and I wouldn't have been all right. But I have... I suppose, I know that sometimes, those decisions have to be made and we have to make them. I don't say that you don't — I know you do — but I think, after spending so long in Seventh District, I could say when something had to happen for the benefit of many, and acted accordingly. I could have killed Keitarou, this time around. I didn't want to, but I would have, if he had threatened my people directly. And I could've stopped Anabomi, too — because nobody would want to live like that. You're the one who's always hated the idea of killing someone, even out of duty. I know you're capable — and now we've both seen the proof — but it bothers me that you'd shoulder that burden alone, and double your own guilt by not letting me help."

"Don't be foolish," Shunsui snorted, refilling his sakazuki and sipping the contents. "Everything you say is probably true, but in this particular scenario, all bets are off. You can't pretend that that boy doesn't bother you. You said, this morning, that he was upset. You sent men to protect him, not to find Keitarou. You might've been able to do as you say, if Koku hadn't been involved — but he was, and that changed everything. Koku is an innocent and you knew it — therefore doing something to hurt him would've been much more difficult for you to face."

He reached out a hand to pat his friend's arm.

"You're an idealist, I'm not," he added. "You can kill the bad guys and protect the good guys, but not everything is black and white. I don't see anything but shades of grey, and I don't know, most of the time, if there's any such thing as good or bad. Even here in Seireitei — holding the swords, making the decisions... that doesn't make us right. We learned that, years ago, the ones in power aren't always those who promote justice. Still, even though taking Keitarou's life was against my grain, I could do it. I knew it had to be done, so I did it. It leaves a bad taste in my mouth, and I probably won't sleep for a while... but Koku came to me because he knew I was capable. Not just in spirit power, but in my mindset. He knew that, if it became necessary, I could kill him as well, even if it meant you hated me. You would never have been able to do that... which is why Keitarou's found so many different ways to manipulate you, even without using Chudokuga, over the years."

"Harsh judgement," Juushirou said reprovingly, "on both our characters."

"That doesn't make it any less true," Shunsui shrugged. "Listen, Juu. You went at the Council with all guns blazing, today. You put your life and your haori on the line for that boy's sake. I know you were right. I believe Koku is on our side, now, even if I doubted him at first, and that's why I backed you up — though if I'd needed to, I would've abandoned my post and dragged you into exile before they tied you to the proverbial stake. I could've shared what he said with you, and you could've helped me, but I didn't want that. Not because you needed my protection, but because I'd rather fight that kind of battle with my own spirit power and on my own terms. I didn't want you dragged into Katen Kyoukotsu's games... especially this one, because I took a big risk. I hadn't ever used it in battle before, and I didn't know if I could defeat a genius with strategy. Fortunately, I did, but he could've killed me. I didn't need a distraction or you near the Senkaimon, in case I was defeated and Koku's vision came true. And, there was one other reason, too."

"Which was?"

"That boy," Shunsui said earnestly, tapping his fingers against the ceramic of the sake bottle. "I didn't want you to be complicit in the death of Kohaku's father."

"But..."

"I know that your interest in him is more than just political, and it's more than just charity," Shunsui continued simply. "A long time ago, I remember you saying that, even if you didn't have your own children, maybe, one day, you'd find someone else like Shikiki who needed your help. Whether he asked for it or not is debateable, but I think you've made Koku that person. You defended him in there like a father would defend his son, and you've been like that with him since the start. I couldn't make you a part of what I had to do. I had to do it, and I don't regret it, but it was my job and not yours. You're someone Koku trusts. Do you think that relationship would've been able to continue if you had been party to this plot?"

"As I understand it, this plot was Koku's idea," Juushirou objected, but Shunsui shook his head.

"No. It wasn't," he replied softly. "It was what Koku saw, it wasn't his idea. He had two futures in his mind, and he chose to bring one of them true — the death of his father. He said that he'd not acted in the past, but that this time, he had to, else lots of people would die. If the other future had happened, it would've wiped us all out, Juu. You, me, everything. He made me see bits of it, and I'm glad I never got to see the whole thing. Maybe that was when I believed that he really didn't want you to die. He mightn't have been looking for a mentor, but he found one and I believe that you're more to him than just his keeper."

Juushirou pursed his lips.

"Koku loved Keitarou," he said sadly, and Shunsui nodded.

"I think maybe because he did, he wanted to stop him from hurting other people," he reflected. "It's complicated, Juu, when your father isn't a hero. There are things in that boy I understand — maybe it's his Kyouraku blood, or maybe it's not. I just... I'm all right with being the one who took Keitarou away from him. If I'm that, you can be the one to support him from this point on. Whatever he decides, I think he'll look to you for guidance. And you're the one who should give it. If he needs to hate me, he can. I just don't think that he can survive here, in Seireitei, if he has any reason to hate you. He's very fragile... more than I realised, and I don't mean because of his spirit power. He may be an adult in years, but really he's a child who never knew if his father loved him — and that's something I can relate to better than you ever can. I needed to be the villain, and so I was. Now you can be the hero... and take Keitarou's place in Koku's life as mentor and guide."

Juushirou stared, momentarily taken aback, then he sighed, shrugging his shoulders.

"I'm not his father, and I won't try and replace Keitarou, it wouldn't be right," he murmured. "I wish I could say you were wrong, though I know I can't. It has been like that. I want to look after the boy. When Keitarou came to take him from Thirteenth, he spoke as though Koku was a thing, not a person, and it made me so angry. So many things about that man's behaviour towards his son... I think that might've made me more resolved to kill him than I would've been before, so perhaps it was better things happened the way they did. I'm sorry for the burden it put on you, and I'm sorry for the grief it's caused him, but after today's clash with the Council, I'm not angry you did it. And I will keep looking out for Koku. We have a chance to stop the rot, and I intend to stop it. Keitsune-sama's death caused Keitarou's life to be ruined before it had a chance to begin. Koku's been through a lot, but he isn't beyond saving, not yet. Thirteenth — and me — we'll do everything we can to make sure that, even if Katsura and Sakaki were beyond our help, Kohaku isn't."

"Rehabilitating the Aizen name wouldn't go amiss with my kinsfolk in District Eight, either," Shunsui pointed out wryly. "This is where your talents come into their own, though. You have a way with people, and that talent helped, this time, to prevent a much bigger disaster."

He offered a droll smile.

"And, as I understand it, Mitsuki-chan's already slotted herself nicely into the role of surrogate mother," he said flippantly. "You should take the opportunity to keep her here, now you've a child to take care of."

"Shunsui!" Juushirou's eyebrows shot up in indignation at this, but Shunsui spread his hands unrepentantly.

"She was gone a long time, but you wouldn't know it," he said evenly. "If you let her disappear again, Juu, it'll be more fool you."

"We haven't talked, yet, about the future." Juushirou admitted. "We both have things we believe in doing, and that hasn't changed. Nor has the Clan and District divide. I'll do what I can for Koku, first and foremost, and so will she. Anything else can wait until the world has returned to some level of normality."

"Speaking of which, I heard that the Council intend to speak to Minaichi about the Rukon," Shunsui's expression became thoughtful. "I wonder how he'll play that. I mean, assuming that what Koku showed the world was true... but I imagine that it is."

"I don't doubt that it is," Juushirou agreed. "I feel guilty that I ever doubted him — but I can't see him now as the kind of person that Keitarou would make a spy. Minaichi might not be very likeable, but he is duty-bound and we can trust his integrity. That vision showed as much. None of us knew that Kusakawa Shougo was the one experimenting in Rukongai, and I'm sure there's more to that than we know."

"Perhaps it connects with Anabomi's death, judging from the little I gleaned from my Vice Captain before she told me to get lost," Shunsui reflected pensively. "They found something at Ninth with a Third Division crest, and Sora doesn't think it's anything to do with the main house. It doesn't take a genius to tie the threads between that and Anabomi."

"But Anabomi isn't our spy, is he?" Juushirou looked troubled, and Shunsui shook his head.

"No," he agreed. "Anabomi was secretive and private, but I find it hard to believe a proud Kuchiki would turn against his family and side with the man who brought them such grief. No, I think that Anabomi was a victim of misunderstanding caught up in something even he didn't understand. Why he had those items is anyone's guess, but if he and Kusakawa were friends, it's quite possible that he was looking after them without knowing what they were. I'm sure that it was Kusakawa's potion that turned Anabomi, judging by how Hirata described their encounter, not Keitarou's reidoku. Whether Keitarou knew it was there, I don't know, but it seems possible that, if Keitarou was still acting inside Anabomi during his fight with Hirata, that mad scientist might have made him drink it against his will. Or, he thought it was something other than what it was... and drank it in error."

"Either way, his death could've been prevented if we'd known about Kusakawa sooner," Juushirou rubbed his temples, "but with Kusakawa long dead, I don't suppose anyone can blame Minaichi for not reporting everything. Not if he didn't have proof."

"Well, if Anabomi didn't know what Kusakawa was doing, and Minaichi did, but isn't the spy, that means we have to look elsewhere," Shunsui observed. "The only trouble is, even if we find them... I'm not sure we'd ever prove it."

"You have a suspicion, don't you?" Juushirou asked sharply, and Shunsui nodded.

"There were no Urahara at Third," he said grimly. "Twelfth Division never sent people to guard the Senkaimon... the Gate that Keitarou needed to launch his ambush on Nagesu-sama and the others."

"Sekime?" Juushirou's eyes almost fell out of his head, and Shunsui shrugged.

"I know, it sits ill with me too, but she's the only person I can think of who would have been close enough to Kusakawa to know anything, and to want to exact revenge of some kind for his death," he admitted. "I never thought of her as the subversive type, but then, I don't know her as well as I could."

"I thought I knew her, but if you're right, I wonder," Juushirou looked stricken. "But no, Shunsui, wait. She gave Nagesu-sama's information to me. She gave me data which ultimately helped Ketsui and Izumi to forge their theories. And she was used by Keitarou to attack Minaichi. Why would he do that, if she was working for him?"

"Because he didn't?" Shunsui's eyes became grave. "Juu, when Keitarou spoke to you, did he mention Anabomi? Did he mention what he'd done since arriving in Seireitei?"

"Mm," Juushirou looked grim. "He bragged about it, to get a rise out of me. Why?"

"Well, if he said to you what he said to me, then the answer's in his own words," Shunsui said simply. "Juu, Keitarou took control of the Captains of the Ninth and Tenth Divisions, and the Tenth Vice Captain. He never said anything about the Captain of the Twelfth Division. And..."

"Sekime was pretending to be under his control, in order to avenge her Captain's death?" Juushirou paled. Shunsui shrugged.

"It's a theory," he pointed out. "We have no proof of it, though, so it may be way off the mark. It all fits nicely, but for two things. One, that Michihashi apparently reported to Nagesu-sama late last night that Mareiko-chan was under some kind of foreign control when she attacked her Division, and secondly, that Minaichi apparently reported the same thing when he came here for help."

"Enishi said so," Juushirou confirmed, "which is probably why I never considered what Keitarou said to me at all. Keitarou might've been trying to create a scapegoat, but he might not. Michihashi might've been mistaken, since he was doped with kidou... but why would Minaichi lie, if she came for his life?"

"You saw the vision," Shunsui said frankly. "Minaichi was in love with Mareiko-chan, and if he was then, his silence means he probably still is now. Of course he wouldn't betray her. Not even if she wanted him dead. Just like you've failed to mention Mitsuki's little indiscretion over Katsura to the Council thus far."

"Gah," Juushirou buried his head in his hands, and Shunsui reached across to pat his friend's shoulder reassuringly.

"I know. Intrigue never sits well with good sake, does it?"

"I'm getting used to the combination," Juushirou groaned. "All right. So what do we do? Do we mention these suspicions, or do we let it lie?"

"I think we leave it to the Council," Shunsui said matter-of-factly. "Keitarou is dead, and whatever secrets there were floating around about Kusakawa, now they're all coming out. I like Mareiko-chan, Juu. I think she's a good Captain — and I don't imagine, after Nagesu-sama's heard everything about Kusakawa, he's going to want to hear about more of his kin committing treason. We'll see what they come up with, and how things pan out."

"But if she's dangerous..?"

"In that chimera, Kusakawa said that Mareiko didn't know anything about what he was doing, and he intended to kill her," Shunsui said softly. "I can't imagine that she knew those things. I don't know, Juu. I can't picture her as a vicious, traitorous criminal against Seireitei. She had beef with Minaichi, and she may have done some silly things to create an opportunity for revenge. But... we can't prove anything, and so I suggest we let it lie. Sometimes it's better the devil you know. If we're wrong, no harm done. If we're right, we can keep an eye on her without her knowing we suspect anything. And, if she is really a traitor, and not just an idiot making bad decisions under Keitarou's considerably persuasive influence, then we'll have had a chance to build a meaningful case against her."

Juushirou let out his breath in a rush, reaching for the sake bottle. Slowly, he nodded.

"All right," he admitted. "We'll do it your way. We'll keep it between us, and see how things pan out. I agree that enough dust has been stirred up for one lifetime... we should at least give it a chance to settle, so we can see who everyone really is."

"And there's been no change since then?"

Kai cast his companion a quizzical look, his brow furrowed in deep consternation. "Saku, are you certain you searched her for any and everything? I know you're usually thorough, but perhaps when she screamed and fainted, maybe she was trying to distract you, and..."

"I'm certain, sir, I had searched her and I was preparing to take her down when the message came from Endou-taichou," Saku spoke politely, but Kai could tell from the glitter of frustration in her eyes that she was growing tired of repeating the same information over and over again. "She screamed, she fainted, she was taken downstairs and since then, she's been like this. We've kept a close twenty-four hour watch on her, in case it's a trap, but if it is, it's one that's operating on a long haul agenda."

"I see,"

Kai rested his hands against the bars of the cell, his gaze running over the chamber's sole occupant one more time. Eiraki was being held in the securest part of the Second Division's prison accommodation, but her room was clean, if simple, and furnished with the absolute necessities on account of her status as a Clan hime. As a result, it was not as dank or as stale as some of the other cells within the fledgling Maggots Nest complex, and even from here Kai could see a fresh basin of water and a small, reinforced mirror set on the side for the prisoner to wash and neaten her appearance as she saw fit.

It had not been touched, and nor had the plate of food that sat on the shelf alongside it.

Eiraki was sitting on the floor of the room, leaning up against the cold outer wall, with a rough shawl pulled around her shoulders. This had been on Kai's own instructions for, when he had first received the alert from Saku, he had been anxious about the prisoner catching cold or taking sick. He had seen it as a ploy to get herself transferred, but as time had gone on, and Eiraki had maintained her vigil, Kai had started to believe something else was seriously wrong.

Eiraki was silent, her eyes vacant, her lips moving occasionally but forming no kind of word. Her clothes were rumpled and unkempt, unattended since her arrest, and her hair had not been touched since the journey from Rukongai.

"And she's not moved since the last time I came down here?"

"No, sir. She's not moved at all, and she didn't even react when I brought her her food," Saku shook her head. "I don't know if it's some kind of hunger strike, or if she's taken something, but it's as though her body's here and her mind is somewhere else completely."

"I'm not a healer," Kai said grimly, "but I have seen this kind of behaviour before. My cousin, Tomoyuki was like this, when he took Eiminyaku in an attempt to kill himself. It's a slow acting, debilitating drug, and if she's taken it, probably, we won't be able to do anything about it. Still, if you're sure you searched her, that seems unlikely. Unless she took it somehow before we left Rukongai... but that would mean she knew that we were coming, and expected to be put under arrest.”

“I don’t think she took anything, sir,” Saku pursed her lips, leaning up against the wall opposite the cell door. “Whatever this is, I don’t think it’s an attempt at suicide. Midori-sama trained me in all the necessary arts of a Shihouin, and I understand about Eiminyaku and its uses. Eiraki-hime is an Endou, however, not a Shihouin. Would she even know of such a potion, even if she had the materials available to her in Rukongai?”

“I put nothing past the self-proclaimed wife of that man,” Kai admitted. ‘All right. Open the door. I’ll go and see if I can speak to her. Don’t worry,’ as Saku looked doubtful, “if she tries anything, I’ll restrain her before she gets a chance to slip our hold. We’re not letting her go anywhere... Keitarou might be dealt with, but Eiraki has her own charges to face and it’s for us to make sure she faces them.”

“Yes, sir,” Saku sighed, but nodded, producing the heavy key from the chain on her obi and sliding it into the lock of the door. It creaked slightly as she turned it, then the door swung stiffly open, just enough for Kai to slide through the gap and into the cell beyond.

Eiraki did not react to his entrance, and as Kai approached her, he felt an eerie sense of déjà-vu, remembering Onoe’s blank stare. And yet, as he knelt down before the young woman, reaching out to touch her gently on the arm, he realised that Saku was right. Eiraki’s eyes were empty, but they were not dead and soulless. Rather, it was as though they had clouded over, like the light had been extinguished from within to leave only darkness and confusion in its place. Eiraki had not taken any drug, he realised with a jolt, as he cupped his other hand beneath her chin, turning her face to his and examining her with more care. This was something deeper, something darker.

“Did Keitarou do this to you?” he wondered aloud, and, as though stirred by the sound of her husband’s name, Eiraki flinched slightly, her eyes flickering briefly before returning to the same, dull gaze as before. She had not pushed away his touch, Kai realised, nor was there any sign of the feral defiance he had seen up until the announcement of Keitarou’s death had spread through Soul Society. He sat back on his heels, contemplating.

“Saku?” he called, and Saku’s face appeared at the cell door. “Saku, this sounds extreme, and I hope you’ll forgive me for asking you, but I want your opinion on something.”

“Yes sir?” Saku looked startled, and Kai chewed on his lip.

“Have you ever been in love with anyone?”

“Sir?” Saku’s eyes became huge, and Kai looked rueful. He shrugged.

“I don’t want to know any details about your personal life, past or present,” he assured her quickly. “It’s not that. I just... I’ve never been in love with anyone, so I can’t pretend I understand its complexities. I wondered if you had any experience that I didn’t in that regard.”

“Is it relevant to Eiraki-hime’s condition for me to answer, sir?” Saku was clearly uncomfortable, and Kai nodded.

“I think so,” he said apologetically, and Saku sighed.

“Once, I was,” she admitted reluctantly. “It was a foolish match, and nothing came of it. But I loved him very much.”

“To the point that you would do anything for him?”

“Sir, I don’t see what this...”

“Eiraki’s condition,” Kai cut across her protestations, jerking his head towards his silent companion. “It seems crazy, but I was wondering. In your opinion, do you think love could do this to someone?”

“Love?” Saku blinked, and Kai frowned.

“Or lost love,” he amended. “Eiraki seems to me like she’s in some kind of shocked trance. I wondered... if it was possible to love someone that much. If Eiraki’s current behaviour isn’t drug-induced, or an act, but grief and shock because her husband is dead. But I don’t really understand being in love, so if you do, I’d appreciate your input. Like I said, personal details aren’t important. I just want to work out what we’re dealing with and whether there’s a way to treat it. Eiraki needs to stand trial for murdering Ribari-sama. Like this, though, that won’t be possible, and before we can cure her, we need to know what the cause was.”

“Oh, I see,” Saku’s features visibly relaxed, and she offered a rueful smile. “I’m sorry, sir. Those memories are still a little tender inside of me, and I prefer not to bring them out. But...”

She frowned, and Kai saw her gaze flit towards Eiraki thoughtfully. Slowly she nodded.

“In my opinion, a broken heart can be as devastating an affliction as any physical wound,” she said softly. “Losing someone you love is not nice, Kai-dono. If the one I loved had died... even though we had parted... I think I would have dealt with it very badly indeed. Perhaps not quite like this, but... my situation is not like Eiraki-hime's. She left her whole life to be Keitarou's wife, and she made him her world. Perhaps such a blow can cause this kind of shock... but how to cure it, I do not know."

"We'll have to ask someone from Fourth to come and examine her," Kai decided, getting to his feet and dusting down his hakama absently. Eiraki did not react, nor did she show the slightest bit of interest when Saku opened the door once more to let her supervisor out, and Kai stepped over the threshold, letting out a heavy sigh.

"That complicates things," he admitted. "I hope it's temporary. Guren-sama has waited a long time to get justice for Ribari-sama's death."

"Shall I go to Fourth, sir?" Saku asked quizzically. "It seems quite urgent, and the Council will want a report — so will Midori-sama. They'll want to know that we're doing everything we can — so quicker seems better."

"Yes, go. Go and bring someone back with you, if you can," Kai agreed, running his fingers through his thick violet hair with a grimace. "And Saku?"

"Yes, sir?"

"Heaven forbid me ever to fall in love, if it lays you open to this kind of weakness."

Saku cast him an amused glance, and Kai held up his hands.

"Respond to that and I'll discipline you," he warned her with a grin. "Go, fulfil your orders. I'll stay here till you return. Eiraki's a top priority prisoner and whatever her condition, there's no letting down our guard."

It was growing late, the sun having long since set over the horizon, yet from First Division to Thirteenth, Seireitei remained a hive of activity.

At Seventh, the Captain's office was in semi-darkness, and Kikyue pushed back the door cautiously, wondering whether her father was even present, for the shadows of the chamber seemed to suggest he had left the barracks to attend to some business elsewhere. At first she could not see him, but then, out of the darkness, she saw a figure move, and she hurriedly bowed her head, slipping through the divide into the room proper and closing the door softly behind her.

“I’m sorry to disturb you, Otousama,” she said softly, “but there’s a message from Nagesu-sama. Yunosuke-dono brought it — apparently the Council of Elders is to meet again tomorrow, to address the issues relating to Minaichi-taichou and the vision we all saw, and he wanted to make sure in advance that you would be present. You’re the only Council member who saw the chimera, so apparently they need your testimony in particular.”

“I see,” There was a slight rustling sound, then the room became illuminated as Hirata activated the Kidou lamp nearest to his desk. “It’s fine, Kikyue. I’ll send a Hell Butterfly to Nagesu-sama directly — I’ll attend, of course. It’s my duty, so I shall.”

“Otousama, are you all right?” Kikyue hesitated, then ventured the question, and Hirata glanced at her, offering her a faint smile. He lifted his hand, gesturing for her to approach the desk, and she did so, standing a respectful distance away. Her Captain cast his glance over her, then he nodded.

“I’m all right,” he admitted. “But it’s such a strange feeling, after so much has happened. I suppose I’m trying to make sense of it all — and there’s so much to make sense of, it’s hard to know where to start.”

“Sir?” Kikyue looked confused, and Hirata sighed, taking off his glasses and setting them down on the desk before rubbing his eyes.

“I’ve made a decision regarding Souja’s post in the Division,” he said softly. “That, and other things.”

“Oniisama’s...” Kikyue’s eyes became clouded, and she nodded her head. “You mean, Vice Captain?”

“Yes, that’s what I mean.”

There was a moment of silence between them, then Kikyue spoke.

“It’s Hajime-dono, isn’t it?”

A further silence, then Hirata inclined his head again.

“That is the way I’m thinking,” he admitted. “It’s traditional for the spot to be held where possible by the heir to the Clan, and in my case, I have no heir. I have you, but... Kikyue... I...”

“I don’t want Oniisama’s badge,” Kikyue said firmly. “I never did, and I don’t now. I’m not ready, Otousama. The things that Niisama did, I can’t do, not yet. I’m a different kind of person. I know that... I know it best of all because of what happened when Keitarou’s son attacked Seventh Division. I can be rashly driven by my emotions and that’s not something a Vice Captain should do. I can hurt people who aren't my enemies, and besides..."

She bit her lip, then,

"Oniisama was an Endou, but he had so much control over the predator inside," she whispered, tears glittering on her lashes as she remembered her brother. "I'm not like that. I'm... I'm not like him, or like Ojiisama. I'm like you, Otousama. I find it hard, sometimes, to control my kestrel's spirit. I know Grandfather made sure you were held back until you were in a position whereby you could take office in Seventh and not cause harm. I'm not at that point yet... and I don't want to become the kind of Endou who kills first and asks questions later."

"Kikyue..." Hirata gazed at her in surprise, then he smiled, retrieving his glasses and toying with them between his fingers.

"You have already grown up a huge amount," he observed, and Kikyue could hear the relief and pride in his voice. "Your brother would be proud of you for that, you know. Souja always believed in you one hundred and ten percent. I know he'd approve of what you just said to me, and I promise, I'll do all I can to ensure that you're able to progress in the way you want. Hajime is a good, solid officer, and I can trust him to fill Souja's rank and do the mundane parts of the duty to his utmost ability. He isn't as potentially powerful as we both know you are, but that's the other reason for my decision. I don't want a child of mine in the Vice Captain's seat again, not if it means putting their lives in danger... and the power that an Endou fosters can easily bring danger. I'm glad you understand. It helps that you do."

"Oniisama would approve," Kikyue said simply. "I'll give Hajime-dono my full support, Taichou. You have my word."

"Good," Hirata returned the spectacles to his nose. "Then when things have settled down, I'll submit his name for approval. I haven't spoken to him about it yet, but I trust there'll be no problem. He's proven himself quite adequately alongside you during the crisis, and that should be rewarded."

He sighed.

"Kikyue, at the Council Meeting this morning, I discovered some other facts which I think its important you know," he continued, and Kikyue could hear the note of caution in her father's weary tones. "You know, I think, that Juushirou and Shunsui were both called to speak before us?"

“Yes, sir,” Kikyue was surprised. “But, with respect, I thought that the matters that passed through that session were restricted and private? I know it had to do with the death of Aizen Keitarou, and I’m glad he’s dead, but I’ve been busy with Kanshi-dono and Sora-dono, putting together the pieces of what we found at Ninth for the official report they’re compiling.”

“Ah, of course,” Hirata nodded, then, “it isn’t really Keitarou’s death that I want to talk to you about. It’s something else, which may... potentially... have greater repercussions for all of us.”

“I’m listening,” Kikyue’s brows knitted together, and Hirata let out another sigh.

“You know, I think, that you aunt is in Second Division custody?”

“She’s not my aunt, sir, she’s a traitor to Seireitei.”

“Indeed,” Hirata pursed his lips. “I suppose that’s true. In your eyes, Eiraki wouldn’t be anything else. In any case, it hardly matters. Whether she’ll ever be tried for her crimes is currently under question. I had a message from Kai earlier on this evening to say that she collapsed following the news of Keitarou’s death. They’re watching her in case it’s a trap, but someone from the Fourth has seen her and believes she’s fallen into some catatonic state of shock. What will happen in the long run I have no idea... the matter of Ribari-sama’s murder still requires justice, but I’ve heard nothing from Guren-sama’s quarter and clearly, if she remains in that state, she’s unlikely to be tried.”

“I don’t really care,” Kikyue said honestly. “Like I said, sir, to me she’s not my aunt. She’s a traitor and a woman I never met. I know she’s different to you, but to me, that’s all she is. It’s for the Council to deal with her as they see fit, just like they did with Keitarou.”

“Yes, perhaps,” Hirata paused, then, “but it’s not really Eiraki, but her children that I wanted to talk to you about.”

“Her children?” Kikyue stiffened, remembering the bloody state of Souja’s body. “I know Joumei killed the girl who took my brother away. The other one, the one who invaded here, we’ve not found a trace of a body, but I’m sure we’ll keep looking. Hajime-dono is determined, too. We’ll find him and bring him in, sir.”

“I wasn’t talking about him,” Hirata seemed hesitant, as though apprehensive about what to say, and Kikyue stared at him in consternation.

“Otou... sama?”

“Eiraki and Keitarou have another son, Kiki.” Hirata admitted, and at the old, affectionate nickname, Kikyue swallowed hard.

“You haven’t called me that since I was tiny,” she murmured. “Souja-nii did, often, but as soon as I started using a sword, you said I should be addressed as an adult and you’ve never called me Kiki since.”

“I know, but this is me speaking to my daughter, not my Third Seated officer,” Hirata said heavily. “Kikyue, it seems that Juushirou and Shunsui kept an important secret from me — from both of us. That secret is the fact that the boy who brought your brother back... who intervened and chased away the girl who killed him... who, even, warned him that his life was in danger in the first place... was Keitarou’s second son, Kohaku.”

“What?” Colour drained from Kikyue’s features, and Hirata reached across the desk to brush his fingers against hers.

“I know. It was a shock to me, too.”

“The boy I... the one who...” Kikyue’s fingers slipped over the hilt of her sword, and Hirata nodded again.

“Yes. He’s been in the care of the Thirteenth since then. In that time, he apparently put himself on Juushirou’s mercy and changed sides. The one who projected the chimera was Kohaku. From the meeting we had this morning, it’s clear that he played a big part in our victory yesterday... and was complicit in helping Shunsui to kill Keitarou. I don’t know this lad, Kikyue, I haven’t met him. But Juushirou was willing to stand before the Council and risk everything to protect him, so I believe he is probably not as his siblings were. It seems... he is not an enemy, and the Council are not judging him as an enemy. There is no proof of guilt in his quarter, so, although they will meet him, the Council intend to let him go.”

“And you wonder if I’ll take it upon myself to kill him after that happens?” Kikyue asked quizzically. Hirata shrugged.

“I don’t know,” he owned. “Juushirou didn’t tell me because he expected that kind of reaction from me. Before I faced Anabomi, perhaps that would have happened. My anger didn’t dissipate with Anabomi, nor was it sated by Keitarou’s death, but I suppose, in that fight, I saw how a shinigami can become a monster bent only on killing. An Endou shinigami is little better if he or she allows that killer impulse to overtake them. I can’t bring back my son, Kikyue, and it’s my greatest regret. However, I will not kill the young man who brought him home. Whoever he is... the anger I ought to feel, I don't."

"And if he challenges you? Uses his bloodline to try and claim favour with the Clan?" Kikyue murmured. Hirata nodded.

"You've seen that, too?" he asked. "I thought you would. In the absence of an heir, of course, something must be done there. I will talk to Juushirou, and see what can be negotiated. I am intending to declare your aunt's marriage to Keitarou null-and-void, if I can, and if this young Kohaku is willing to accept the stigma of illegitimacy, I intend to accept him and move on."

Kikyue was silent for a moment, then,

"With respect, sir, are you holding back because you think it's the right thing to do, or because you don't want to make Juushirou-dono cross with you?" she asked astutely. "If he's backing this boy's cause, surely..."

"I don't want to kill someone who's done nothing to deserve being killed for," Hirata said pensively. "I think that's a good value to cling hold of, even if it doesn't come naturally to people like you or I. Isn't that why we shelter Joumei? Besides, Souja wanted it this way. He begged for us to protect the boy, and even though Juushirou took the promise on, it extends to me as well. If Kohaku does something to make himself an enemy of the Endou or of Seireitei, I won't hold back. If he challenges me, I will do my level best to eradicate the danger... but from what I've heard, that seems unlikely. He doesn't appear to possess an Endou spirit. I'm hoping that we can negotiate, so that the Clan don't feel threatened by his existence."

Kikyue sighed.

"I have spent a lot of time thinking about when I attacked him," she admitted. "I felt bad for it, when I knew he'd helped Oniisama. Now you're saying he was Keitarou's son, and so maybe my instincts weren't wrong, even if my target was. But... Oniisama... did he know, do you think? Did he know who helped him, the day he died?"

"I believe he must have, or at least, suspected," Hirata agreed. "He wouldn't have asked so desperately otherwise, if he just thought the boy a random stray. No, your brother made this decision for us... and more than upsetting Juushirou, I don't want to unsettle Souja's ghost. He was a voice of reason to the hunters inside both you and I, and I want to keep that element of him with us, even if he's no longer here. I believe that his death was the first step in bringing Keitarou to justice, and he was a sacrifice of war to a greater cause. He didn't die as an Endou, Kikyue, but as a shinigami, and sometimes... we have to see ourselves as shinigami, and forget the Clan traditions that bind us together.”

Kikyue was silent for a long time, digesting this, then,

“I won’t hurt him, Otousama. The boy, I mean. I won’t do anything to touch him,” she said eventually. “Oniisama felt that way, so I will try to, too. Even if he is Keitarou’s son... he did bring my brother home and I am grateful that he did. So long as he accepts that his bloodline is unsuitable for the Clan, and doesn’t seek to take my brother’s place... I will leave him alone.”

“When he stands before the Council, I will meet him for myself,” Hirata agreed. “Then, I suppose, I’ll know what kind of man he is. If Souja, Juushirou and Shunsui all wanted to defend him, there must be something worth defending. And I know full well the danger of being judged according to your bloodline. I grew up in Seimaru’s shadow, and so if Kohaku proves benign, I won’t try and prevent him from finding his own life here.”

“As your nephew, sir, or as a stranger who happens to reside here?” Kikyue asked sharply, and Hirata shrugged his shoulders.

“It depends on the boy and on the way things turn out,” he admitted. “For the time being, I simply wanted you to know the situation. I won’t tell you how to view him or expect you to judge him as family, and I don’t know, yet, if I will ever consider him so. I will ride home at first light, and have already sent messages to your grandfather to summon together my key advisors, as I don’t think this matter can be left to rest without their knowledge and involvement. I will tackle them on my own and see what transpires, but I wanted to be certain that you wouldn’t take matters into your own hands. The Kill on Sight order has been rescinded, and to act against him now would put Seventh in more trouble it can’t afford.”

“There’s Tenichi’s hearing, too, to settle,” Kikyue acknowledged grimly. “You are going to stand by him, sir, aren’t you? So he lost his temper and his wits a little... we need him, and I won’t believe he was ever in league with that man.”

“I will listen to the evidence and judge him when there is a verdict to consider, not before,” Hirata said sombrely. “I understand your feelings, Kikyue, but right now, I intend to let Seireitei justice speak for our Eighth Seat. I will abide by the decisions they make. If he’s proven not guilty of treason and collaboration, then I will accept him back when his punishment is over. But there are bigger issues to resolve before he’s brought for judgement... not least the business at

Ninth.”

“Mm,” Kikyue frowned. “I don’t know, Otousama. Mikihara is still a comatose, bloody mess, and there’s no other officer above Sixth Seat there. The whole place is in shock and chaos, and I can’t see any solution for it but to close down the Ninth until such time when there are suitable officers to lead it. Ryu-dono has been at the barracks helping to sort things out, but it’s clear he won’t take the role on permanently, and Mikihara might yet die or be so maimed he can’t return to office.”

“As I said, there are bigger issues to resolve,” Hirata agreed. “Still, at least one piece of good has come out of this. Have you been to see Ohara today?”

“Not yet,” Kikyue admitted. “I’ve been at Eighth a lot of the day, and then at Ninth, gathering things for the report. I heard that he was awake, though. Nakata said he’s seen him... apparently he’s come out of whatever Keitarou did to him completely now.”

“I understand that was another part of Kohaku’s chimera. He had the power to break Keitarou’s spell, and he freed Joumei from it, too, although Joumei withheld that information from us when we asked,” Hirata mused. “However it happened, though, it’s a relief to know there was some purpose behind your bringing Ohara back alive. Seventh are low on seated officers at full fitness, so we need him.”

“I’ve missed him,” Kikyue admitted honestly. “I didn’t think I ever could, because he drives me up the wall most of the time. But when he turned on me in the forest, I saw in his eyes how afraid he was to hurt me, and how much he’d rather I killed him than the other way around. I suppose he has more use to him than I’d realised — and it will be a help, having an extra head and pair of hands to do tasks. It’s just a pity that Anabomi-taichou’s office is so much cleaner now we’ve been investigating and sorting out... I would’ve liked to see his reaction to all that blood.”

“Ohara is an Endou. He would’ve done the job as per his brief, no matter how much he might’ve complained about the mess,” despite himself, Hirata’s lips twitched into a smile. “I think you should go see him, though. You are his patrol officer, and he is your second. I have given him today to rest, but I will expect him up and about tomorrow, since he doesn’t appear to have any permanent damage.”

“I’ll go now, then, sir,” Kikyue decided. “I’ll keep in mind all you’ve said to me and I’ll think it over, I promise. I won’t do anything rash about it... I’ll trust the Council and Oniisama and leave it alone for now. Without Tenichi and with Nakata still injured, my patrol is short-handed anyway. I'll go brief Ohara on all the things he's missed. I'm sure I can find him extra chores to do to make up for his absence."

She bowed her head, withdrawing from the chamber and pulling the door softly shut behind her before making her way slowly along the corridor that led to the officers' quarters, deep in thought.

Her father's preference for Hajime as his next Vice Captain had not shocked her, nor had it upset her in the slightest, for she had already resolved in her own heart that, if Hirata had suggested promoting her, she would have refused and recommended the Fourth seat in her place. Hajime was older, more experienced, more objective and, she owed to herself, more capable of managing the duties Souja had left behind. Since her brother's death, she had been forced to feel many things that she would sooner have never encountered, but because of it, she had also been able to see herself in a more open light, viewing and assessing her own flaws and resolving, bit by bit, to overcome them.

I'll be the shinigami you wanted me to be, Oniisama, and I can do that just as well at my current rank. You won't see it, maybe, but it doesn't make it any less important that I do it. If I remember everything you taught me, and the way you managed things, then it will be like your existence here was important and your influence remains. I can't hear you speak out loud any more, nor feel your hand on my shoulder when I'm frustrated or upset. But I can see you, in my mind's eye, and in my head, I can always hear your voice. When Father called me Kiki, it reminded me of that close childhood we shared, and maybe, it's strengthened my bond with him now, too. Everything you left behind, Souja-nii, its in safe hands. Hajime-dono and I, between us, we'll do Father proud. And whatever my destiny as an Endou hime... as a Seventh Division shinigami, I will not let anyone down.

With this resolve in her heart, she reached her destination, rapping sharply on the chamber door and waiting impatiently to be called in. There was a moment of silence, then she heard the cultured tones of her subordinate, and she pushed back the door, stepping purposefully into the room. Unlike the office, Ohara's chamber was brightly illuminated by kidou lamps, for the occupant had been reading, but at the sight of her, he hastily tossed his book aside, scrambling to his feet. He was dressed, Kikyue realised with a jolt, robed in plain, fresh shihakushou, though his sword still lay in its sheath against the wall, and his dark hair was loose over his shoulders, as opposed to fastened in its normal warrior queue. The expensive silver clasp that normally held it, engraved with the hunting bird of the Endou Clan lay on the bedside unit, and as Ohara got to his feet, Kikyue was aware of his gaze darting towards it, as though he had been caught with his guard down.

“You don’t need to,” she said, before he could reach over to pick it up. “Father told me you’d been given today at ease. I’m not conducting an inspection, and you’ve been indisposed. I didn’t expect to see you in uniform — I had supposed you were still in bed, especially considering it’s late.”

“Hime.” Ohara swallowed hard, bowing his head towards her, and Kikyue offered him a brisk, rueful smile.

“I’m not cross with you. Nobody is,” she assured him. “If you’re not up and out bright and early tomorrow to help me clear up the rest of the Ninth Division, then I will be, but right now, I’m not. What happened out there wasn’t your fault. We all know that. You should forget it. It’s not an Endou trait, to dwell on trivial things.”

“To attack my Clan’s hime is not a trivial matter,” Ohara raised his gaze, and Kikyue could see the deep self-censure and shame in his eyes. “Whatever the reason, my actions were unforgivable. You should not have forgiven me. I raised my blade to you and would’ve killed you. Why didn’t you kill me?”

“Because I’m done giving members of Seventh over to the whims of a madman,” Kikyue said matter-of-factly, gesturing for her companion to sit down and he did so, hesitantly perching on the end of the bed without taking his gaze off her for a moment. Kikyue was struck by the uncertainty in the normally pompous man’s aura, and, as she regarded him anew, she could see how pale he still was, the shadows beneath his eyes telling of the strain he had been under.

In a moment, she understood.

“You weren’t unconscious, were you?” she demanded, and Ohara flinched, starting at the sudden sharpness in her voice. “All that time, between the forest and now... you were paralysed, but you were still able to hear us, weren’t you? You were awake the whole time.”

Ohara faltered for a moment, then, slowly, he lowered his head in acknowledgement.

“I didn’t intend eavesdropping on any of the conversations held here,” he said gravely. “The secret of the silver-haired boy, I understand now, and I will speak of it to noone, because it was not for my ears to hear. You have no idea of the terror involved, hime, in having your whole body under another’s control, then in being frozen and unable to move, unable to sleep, unable to do anything whilst a demon plays havoc with your heart. Then... hallucinations... and suddenly... the demon was gone.”

“And Father released the kidou, when he knew the spell was broken,” Kikyue murmured. “I didn’t know. I thought I had stunned you... I didn’t realise you were conscious for the whole time. I’m sorry, Ohara. That was my misjudgement. I wanted to save your life — I wasn’t intending to torture you for what happened. You didn’t mean to hurt me. I know you never would.”

“Hime?” Ohara blinked, and Kikyue grimaced, pulling a graphic face.

“You probably know about Tenichi, too, if you overheard us talking about Joumei.”

“Yes,” Ohara’s expression became grave, and Kikyue nodded.

“Then you’ll also know that I’m resolved,” she said quietly. “This is Seventh Division. It is the province of Endou and a home of shinigami, it isn’t for outsiders to come in and rip us apart. I expect Tenichi to be returned to us, even if he has to serve some time before he is, and when he is, I’ll turn him into a proper, ruthless fighter who won’t shame the uniform a second time. You are my patrol second, so I want you to absorb that mentality, too. Whatever happens from hereon in, I’m not willing to sacrifice Seventh’s squad members along the way.”

“Those sound like the words of a Vice Captain, hime,” A little of the swagger had returned to Ohara’s voice at this, and Kikyue snorted, shaking her head.

“I won’t be,” she said matter-of-factly. “Taichou hasn’t spoken to him yet, but he’s spoken to me, and I’m speaking to you, on the understanding you don’t discuss it with anyone until its formally arranged. The new Vice Captain will be Hajime-dono... and I intend to support him wholeheartedly. It’s what I want, Ohara, so whatever your personal feelings, I expect you to do so too.”

Ohara was silent for a moment, then he shrugged his shoulders.

“When I was forced to attack you, Hajime-dono and Nakata put their lives in peril to ensure your safety. Neither one of them hesitated for even a second,” he said honestly. “I have considered both beneath me based on birth, but between them they acted bravely before my blade. Furthermore, whatever you say, my shame at having attacked you will not fade easily. If those are your wishes, hime, I will not contest them. I will do as you instruct me, to the best of my ability, and attempt — even if it’s only a little — to ease the burden of my sin.”

“The world is changing,” Kikyue said simply. “We have to change with it, you as well as me. Ruthless Endou killers and position based on birth are going to be the thing of the past. The way Taichou was talking, I think it’s something that can’t be stopped. You and I have to prove ourselves just as much as anyone else, regardless of how we were born. Forget what happened in the forest, Ohara, and move on. I don’t need a second who’s constantly fussing about things that happened beyond his control. I need you to be ready to deal with new recruits and new patrol schedules and whatever Seventh Division requires from this point on.”

She grinned, shrugging her shoulders.

“Strikes me that there might be a vacant Fourth Seat spot up for the taking, if you do well,” she added flippantly. “There’s not much blood to wade around in in Ninth, now, lucky for you, so you won’t ruin your tabi like I did yesterday — but if you work hard and help, I’ll recommend to Father that that spot be given to you at the same time Hajime-dono vacates it.”

“I don’t deserve a promotion!” Ohara looked aghast. “I tried to kill you! I...”

“No. No you didn’t.” Kikyue crossed the room, grabbing the man by his shoulders and, despite her diminutive stature in comparison, she hauled him to his feet, giving him a firm shake. “You tried your hardest not to release your sword. Your lips are still swollen and cut because you bit them shut to prevent it from happening. You wanted me to kill you, and you tried tooth and nail to make it stop. I saw courage and determination in you then, Ohara, which won you more points of praise with me than anything you’ve ever said or done before. I thought you were a self-absorbed idiot, to be honest, but now I know there are times when you’re not, and that means I know I can trust you as my patrol second.”

“A self-absorbed...” Ohara visibly wilted at this scathing criticism, then, “that’s truly how you see me?”

“It’s the Ohara Masayuki that comes on duty regularly,” Kikyue was unperturbed. “I’d rather he didn’t bother showing up for work tomorrow, though. I want the man who was willing to die to protect me, only I’d rather you didn’t do the actual dying... because that’d be messy and there’s been enough killing already.”

Ohara stared at her for a moment, then he looked sheepish.

“You truly are not a bit like an Endou hime, no matter how I try to think otherwise,” he murmured. “You must realise how confusing that is for me. I was raised to understand a different kind of woman, but you are a shinigami as much as Fukutaichou was, and you do not need a weak man like me to protect you. Since I became your patrol second, I believe I have known that, which has made my job harder. I will be ready early tomorrow, you have my word. I might sleep tonight, but in truth, I'd rather be active and involved than spend more time in my bed. You can count on me, I promise. You chose to save my life — and whilst you may not appreciate more eloquent language to this effect, I believe that life is truly yours to instruct as you see fit.”

“We can definitely do without the flowery language, or the unnecessary compliments,” Kikyue said thoughtfully. “Oniisama was convinced you were trying to secure my hand in marriage, but I don’t know that I ever intend to marry, and if I do, well, it’s not something I’m ready to consider yet. Most Endou hime are married off early and left at home while their menfolk do all the work, and that doesn’t suit me at all. I won’t be that kind of hime — I’m a shinigami and I intend on being one until the day I die. So if your father did send you into the squad to secure me as your bride, you should tell him that it won’t happen. I’m not looking for a mate. I don’t need one. I’m looking for a patrol second — one I can count on, through thick and thin, and that’s who I want and need you to be.”

Ohara did not respond to begin with, then a sad smile touched his lips.

“Father has never said anything to that effect,” he admitted. “I chose this path of my own free will and I have formed my own loyalties where you are concerned. Whatever I thought before I entered the squad, serving under your command has only strengthened the sensation, and even if it causes you displeasure to hear it, I confess that I think it unlikely my views will change. There is no hime in this Clan or any other who is your like or equal. Well, my mother taught me that some men are fortunate in the women that attract them, and others face a greater challenge. I am not your equal in either birth or ability, nor am I deserving of your attention even if you should wish to make a match. Still, my convictions are unaffected. I am at your command, Kikyue-hime. Now and always, in whatever way you see fit. Though, even if I concede your terms, I cannot guarantee that there will never be an appropriate suitor waiting to marry you. With Souja-dono gone, and Sayuri-hime such a child still, the future of the Endou is uncertain.”

“It’s not uncertain,” Kikyue shook her head, her cheeks pinkening slightly at Ohara’s honesty. “Souja-nii wouldn’t want us to fall apart because of a decision he made, and so we won't. I can't inherit the Clan, but I can still support it. Everything else can wait. We have work that needs doing, and I intend to make sure you help me do it. Nakata is still injured and not much use with that arm, but Joumei's been moonlighting as a shinigami in Tenichi's absence, and so tomorrow I intend to take him, and you with me to Ninth to finish cataloguing everything in Anabomi's office. I know the last time you two met, you were threatening to kill him, but since we're officially on the same side, I'll trust you can work together. There's a lot still to do, and I've two Vice Captains breathing down my neck over this so that they can finalise their report."

"Nakata told me what had happened at Ninth, and I realised how fortunate I was all over again," Ohara spoke gravely. "I will be there, hime. You have my word, I shall not let you down."

"Then I'll see you tomorrow," Kikyue nodded her approval, turning to leave. At the door she paused, glancing back at her fellow officer.

"Sleep," she added. "That's an order. The past is the past, it can't hurt you, and I'll need you alert and on song tomorrow. I won't tolerate laziness or lax mistakes because you aren't fully rested."

With that she left the room, shutting the door behind her but, as she did so, she felt a warm sense of relief stir inside her heart as she made her way back along the hall.

Oniisama is gone, but Seventh Division are still fighting and, bit by bit, everything is coming back together. Whatever he endured between then and now, I'm glad Ohara is alive and I'm glad he's still there as my patrol second. Whatever happens with the Endou now, too, we'll face it together, as a squad should. That's what Souja-nii would've wanted to see most of all... us working together for the benefit of everyone. Maybe even this child of Keitarou's, too. I don't know how I feel about that yet, and I didn't mention it to Ohara, but maybe Father is right about letting him move outside of his father's shadow and live his own life. Endou are good at clinging onto grievances, but there's nobody left alive for me to hate, not now. I'm going to try and move on with my life without my brother's guidance, and I'm going to make my own decisions. I'm going to preserve the life of my men as much as I can, and make sure that I fight as a shinig mi to defend the things shinigami are here to defend.

She paused outside the door of Souja's old chamber, running her fingers briefly over the seams in the wood, then she lowered her hand.

Watch over me, Souja-nii. When you died, your soul left the pyre as smoke. Instead of hunting down your enemies, I hope that you'll watch over us instead. Help us. Protect us. Keep us strong and focused on the things we need to do. You were always my greatest inspiration. Now I'll make sure that I become a shinigami you could be proud of, no matter how long it takes.

Author's Note:

Message to a regular reader and reviewer who currently has PMs blocked — apologies for not replying to your last couple of reviews but the PM block also prevents review replies. So please don't think I'm ignoring you O.O.

74. The Ties That Bind

Chapter Seventy Two : The Ties That Bind

“Atsushi-dono, you may enter the chamber now.”

From the shadows of the entrance, a slim figure began to advance the short distance that separated the door from the arc of seats that held the eight members of the Clans, and from his position to the right, Hirata ran his gaze over his fellow Captain, trying to read his comrade's emotions. Minaichi's eyes were sombre, his expression giving nothing away, and as he reached the heart of the Council Chamber, he dropped down on his knees, giving the regulation obeissance without a moment of hesitation.

“Raise your head, Atsushi-dono,” Nagesu's words were soft, and edged with pain, and at his instruction, Atsushi raised his head, meeting the gaze of the Third Division Captain without a word. Silence reigned between them for a moment, then Nagesu sighed, reaching up to remove his glasses. He rubbed his brow, clearly troubled, and at his action, Atsushi's lips thinned.

“You sent for me, Nagesu-sama,” his words were impossibly calm, and Hirata felt certain that, if he hadn't seen that image of his comrade, desperate, alone and bloody in the Rukon valley, he would never have believed this man had any emotion at all towards the circumstances of twenty five years before. It was the unflappable, military persona that Atsushi had lived by in the whole of their acquaintance, but Hirata found himself reassessing the man in light of new evidence.

“You can be under no misapprehension as to why the Council wanted to speak to you, Atsushi-dono,” Guren's words were quiet, but his voice had the uncanny knack of carrying, and Atsushi's eyes narrowed very slightly, his gaze flitting towards the seat held by the Head of Sixth District. “I trust you have come prepared to speak to us candidly and without reserve.”

Another moment of silence, then Atsushi nodded.

“I seem to be in no position to do anything else,” his words were edged with resignation, and Guren nodded.

“Then we would like to hear, please, your account of what happened in the Rukon, twenty five years ago,” he said simply.

“A statement was given to the Council at the time that incident occurred.”

“A statement which has been roundly suggested to be false,” Nagesu rejoined the conversation at this point, and Hirata’s eyes widened slightly as he registered the genuine anger in Nagesu’s tones. “I am sick of being deceived, whether for my benefit or to my detriment. I am clearly considered a fool by all and sundry, that so many things can go on behind my back. I am obviously simple in my trust in the words of my comrades, but I will tolerate it no longer. I will have the truth of what happened in Rukongai from you, Minaichi Atsushi — here, before the Council as witness, so don’t believe that you can conceal it any longer.”

“Nagesu,” Kyouki held up a placatory hand, but Nagesu shook his head.

“A kinsman of mine was killed in the Rukon, and a kinswoman took serious injury,” he said quietly. “I am entitled to know the truth of that event from the lips of one who was there, and, by all accounts, closely involved in everything that occurred.”

Atsushi’s expression darkened slightly at this, and he nodded.

“Very well,” he said flatly, curling his hand around the hilt of his zanpakutou and pulling it from its sheath. Gently he lay it down on the ground before him, gesturing towards it.

“Minaichi-dono?” Tokutarou’s brows knitted together, and Atsushi mustered a hollow smile.

“Here before you lies the weapon which took the lives of Sakanoue Heiji and Kusakawa Shougo,” he said simply. “I killed both of them. If the Council wishes to pursue justice for their deaths, so be it.”

“There appear to have been mitigating circumstances,” Hirata interjected, and Atsushi arched an eyebrow.

“There are no such things as mitigating circumstances when you are sent on a military mission,” he said coldly. “With respect, Hirata-dono, the events in the Rukon all stemmed from decisions I made as Captain of the Eleventh. I have responsibility in everything that occurred. I am not such a weak man that I shy away from the bald truth.”

“Yet you chose not to report anything of the kind to us when you returned to Seireitei?” Yuuichi asked archly. “If you take that attitude, Minaichi, why did you not lay your sword before the Council then and give them a true account of what happened? Last night, I read Father’s copy of the depositions following that incident, and I know precisely what evidence you gave. If you weren't trying to shield yourself from judgement, and you insist on taking the view that there are no 'mitigating circumstances' involved, then explain yourself to us. You are claiming to have killed two men through incompetence... at the very least, explain why we should not add deception and an attempt to avoid judgement to the list of criticisms."

"Yuuichi-sama, such words are harsh," Retsu said reprovingly.

"I am only speaking to my kinsman in the way he has chosen to report the incident to us," Yuuichi was unrepentant. "Well, Atsushi-dono? Your explanation, please. As your Head of Clan, I wish to know the truth."

For the briefest of moments, Hirata saw Minaichi's passive expression falter, and with a jolt he realised that, beneath the harsh, military exterior, his fellow Captain was only just holding himself together.

"Yuuichi-sama," he began, but Yuuichi held up his hand to stop him.

"Atsushi-dono is a Yamamoto, and I will hear his words," he said frankly. "This is not a matter for the Endou to trespass into, not at this point."

Atsushi closed his eyes for a moment, then opened them, meeting his Clan Leader's gaze head on.

"It was my intention to make a full and detailed report as to the death of Sakanoue Heiji, and I was fully prepared to submit my sword and resign my rank, even receive further punishment for my actions in that regard," he said quietly. "He was a Vice Captain I considered extremely talented and promising, and his loss was to the detriment of Eleventh Division. However, in order to explain Sakanoue's death, I needed... other evidence."

"Evidence relating to my kinsman, Kusakawa Shougo?" Nagesu asked softly, and Atsushi nodded.

"Sakanoue and I had been suspicious of his actions for a while," he admitted with a sigh. "It was my poor judgement that decided we would confront him in Rukongai, because I believed it to be a sound location, away from Seireitei and the possibility of his calling on his Clan or escaping to his territorial holdings. Kusakawa held higher Clan rank than either Sakanoue or I, and was deeply in Nagesu-sama's trust. He boasted as much before me, how he and his father both had benefited from the reidoku scandal and were beyond suspicion in the eyes of the Urahara Clan. He said that Seireitei would blame Keitarou for everything he did, and I had no hard proof of what he was doing. I needed... we needed... him. We needed to arrest him, and make him confess. There was no other hard proof.”

“There was proof,” Nagesu’s expression became grim, and he reached down to scoop up the collection of papers that had rested at his feet. “Proof found in the Real World, by myself and Midori-sama during our sojourn there. Evidence enough to convict Kusakawa Shougo on the highest level of Clan treason and of several counts of malicious behaviour towards Soul Society, including the perpetuation of illegal experiments begun by his late father Daigo — experiments which I strongly believe we encountered in the Real World, and as a result of which, suffered grievous injury.”

He glanced at Kyouki, who nodded, her eyes becoming sad. She made no comment, however, and Nagesu continued, his tones still strained and edgy.

“Given all that we discovered beneath that mountain, the evidence against my kinsman is heavy indeed. With even a fraction of this material presented before the Council, he would’ve been sentenced to death, without question.”

“I had no knowledge of such a place,” Atsushi confessed. “Eleventh Division members sometimes patrolled in the Real World, but I visited it but rarely, and I did not realise his research had spread to that location, too. The outbreaks I knew of were entirely in the Rukon, and so I... erroneously, it seems... believed that his research base was in the Rukon territories.”

“In this regard, Nagesu-sama, Minaichi cannot be considered at fault,” Tokutarou put in evenly. “You and your kin did not know of this research laboratory, either — although from your own account, it was established in the time of Shougo-dono’s father, Daigo. This treason was afoot long before Minaichi was even given his Captaincy — and, most likely, a Captain from outside of the Urahara could not possibly have guessed that things ran as deep as we now know they did. He made a fair judgement based on the evidence before him — evidence which related to outbreaks of mutation in the Rukon Valley.”

“I suppose that is true,” Nagesu sighed, but relented, accepting Tokutarou’s point. He returned the papers to their original position, folding his hands in his lap. “I am sorry, Atsushi-dono. Tokutarou-sama is correct. If we could not know it, as kin, you had no way to realise the depths of his experimentation. You said your suspicions were aroused — will you tell us how and why that occurred?”

“I worked with Kusakawa more than any other Captain,” Minaichi said frankly. “I also went to the Rukon more often than any other. Although there was suspicion towards Aizen, because of his actions against the Kuchiki, I knew those times and dates did not add up. There were days we were dispatched to deal with mutations during times which we clearly knew Aizen Keitarou was not only in Seireitei, but launching direct attacks on members of Guren-sama’s family. Kusakawa was the one who reported to the Captains that there was a discrepancy. This was his arrogance — he told me that he did so in order to make it seem as though his science was incompetent, for he was certain that the Gotei would conclude the massacre in Rukongai to be Keitarou’s work. He wanted to make people look away from him, but his words made me look towards him instead. Seireitei had no other suspect, so I began to think the unthinkable... that perhaps, the real enemy was an ally.”

He glanced down at Mokizuki’s blade, pursing his lips.

“I don’t spend time forming social alliances with my comrades. I work with them, and expect them to hold the same values of duty and discipline I do,” he added. “For a few trips, I simply observed Kusakawa, and how often he disappeared from my line of sight. I never saw him kill any of the mutated creatures, yet when we returned, he always reported a number of kills, and the right number of bodies materialised to meet his claims. There was something... unnatural in the whole business. I could hardly charge into Twelfth and demand truths, however... so I sent Sakanoue, whose pleasant manner I felt would be more disarming. We found no physical evidence, but for both Heiji and I, something was... wrong. I felt certain that Kusakawa’s involvement in the Rukon business was deeper than the Gotei understood, so I made the decision to confront him and try and force a confession from him, through whatever means necessary. We had tried to locate his research facility in the Rukon, but we never found it. I went back to Rukongai a couple of times to look for it, after Sakanoue died, in the hope of locating it and putting the whole truth before Seireitei, but I never found it. My only hope in exposing this was to take Kusakawa himself. I intended to do that, but ultimately, I failed. He confessed to me in full, or rather, boasted of it — but that confession was worthless the moment he lost his life. He could never be made to repeat it, and so my proof died with him.”

“If you had made report to us, we could at least have investigated your claims. Even if we had arrested you, we would’ve looked into the incident thoroughly,” Midori remarked. “That’s the job of the Onmitsukidou, not to mention the responsibility of the Council. Serious crimes committed by Captains are frowned upon in the strictest sense. To find you guilty, or prove you innocent of Kusakawa's murder, we would've left no stone unturned."

"I think it possible that those stones had already been turned, though, Midori-dono," Guren spoke wearily, and Midori turned to glance at him in confusion.

"Guren-sama?"

"Some odd paraphernalia was found at Ninth Division, in the possession of Anabomi Seizuku," Guren pursed his lips. "I understand the Vice Captains of the Eighth and Tenth and the Third Seat of the Seventh are in the process of compiling an official report on all the findings and circumstances, so currently what, exactly, those items were and why they were there isn't clear, though from the initial evidence I'm led to understand that the notebook and the papers Nagesu-dono has imply it may have contained mutated reishi, maybe even taken from Hollows. This ingredient has never been found in reidoku Keitarou produced..?"

He paused, glancing at Nagesu, who nodded a weary confirmation, then continued, "but it seems the casket was decorated with the crest of Kusakawa's branch of the Urahara, and the written documents — though in some kind of code — in Kusakawa's hand."

"Kusakawa said that Anabomi didn't know what he was doing," Atsushi shook his head firmly. "He was quite certain about it — he said that Anabomi would never have perceived the level of his science, and he chose to keep him out of it."

"But those items were definitely located at Ninth," Hirata said slowly. "My officers were the first to enter the scene, and, on consulting with the only coherent witness of the massacre, it seems that Anabomi opened the compartment that held them after he had killed his officers. Whilst it's beyond doubt that he maimed Mikihara and killed the others under the influence of Keitarou's zanpakutou, my officers found an empty vial at the scene. Though the Third have possession of that evidence, and will need to further test the trace residue on the vial to confirm whether the notes are accurate, I'm left in no doubt what it did. Anabomi drank it, and it turned him into the creature I fought in Ninth's courtyard."

He glanced at Guren apologetically.

"I feel Anabomi almost told me as much, in that fight," he added. "When I asked him what had happened to him, he said that something ‘hadn’t worked’, and that he’d wanted to ‘stop it’. The words were in the height of a difficult battle, and I didn’t consider them in any detail until later, but I believe we can consider it testimony from the man himself about what happened immediately after the killing of his men, in the time period for which we have no living witness. Moreover, I also witnessed the chimera that young boy pumped into the atmosphere, in an attempt to break Keitarou’s spell over afflicted shinigami. The way in which Anabomi behaved was eerily similar to how Kohaku’s vision portrayed Sakanoue. If those memories were real and accurate, Atsushi-dono, we need to know that they were. In the vision, you asked Sakanoue if he’d drunk anything. Anabomi clearly drank something. What he thought he was drinking is anyone’s guess, and I believe he thought it to be some kind of cure or antidote against Keitarou’s control. What we can be sure of is that whatever it was, it almost certainly turned Anabomi into a Hollow.”

“Anabomi’s corpse shows deformation, but it bears no permanent evidence of actual Hollowfication,” Retsu added. “My officers are currently examining his blood for anomalies, because of Hirata-sama’s findings, but no such test was carried out on Sakanoue’s corpse. I have retrieved the relevant records from that incident. At the time any bone warping found on his body was put down to having been caused by the wounds that ended his life. There was no permanent evidence of Hollowfication, and since we weren’t looking for any such circumstances, it appeared we didn’t find them. It is only a theory at this time, but it seems likely that, unlike Keitarou’s reidoku, which turned common folk to Hollows in a fairly immediate and irreversible way, Kusakawa’s serum resulted in gradual degrees of Hollowfication, damaging the body but not maintaining the transformation indefinitely. I think it highly unlikely this condition could’ve been cured... and that, in the case of Anabomi Seizuku, death was the greatest mercy he could’ve received. If Sakanoue Heiji’s death was in the same circumstances, and from drinking the same substance, then the same judgement would apply.”

Atsushi’s eyes closed once more, and now Hirata saw a single glistening tear roll silently down the older man’s harsh, battle-worn features.

“I couldn’t save him,” he said softly. “I involved him in my investigation, and I put him at risk... but in the end, all I could do to protect or help him was to take his life. I have spent every day since regretting my inadequacy as a superior officer, and I have worked twice as hard since to discharge my duty efficiently and without the distraction of emotion and affection. Sakanoue’s blood is on my hands — bearing the guilt of that in secret is a far heavier burden than admitting it before your honourable selves here today. Yuuichi-sama, therein lies my answer. I did not confess, because I did not deserve to be forgiven or judged for it. His death is my fault, regardless of the Council's decision, and I am simply a tool of the Gotei, here to serve by my sword until I am no longer of any use to it."

"Harsh words, Atsushi-dono," Kyouki spoke gently, but Atsushi shook his head.

"Too many Clans put their heirs in a position of duty and responsibility," he said thickly. "Sometimes, that choice costs them dear. I am not a Clan leader, but Sakanoue was like my son. I put him in that danger due to my own partiality and desire to see him progress. If I had not, he would not be dead. Such is the fate of war."

Hirata's heart spasmed at these words, an image of his own son coming to mind, and he nodded.

"Atsushi-dono has a point," he said grimly. "We do exactly that, and then we pay the price for doing so. It is a heavy burden — more, one that potentially threatens the future of Soul Society. I, too, have decided to follow the same course of action as Atsushi-dono has. I will not appoint a child of mine as my adjutant again, unless they prove to be the only and most suitable candidate for the job, and I can send them out in absolute confidence of their ability to return home alive."

"We have much to discuss in that regard," Kyouki said evenly. "The matter of Ninth also remains, but for now we must not become distracted. I understand your words, Hirata-dono, because my eldest son's injury is a grave one, and I am fortunate he still has his life. As was made clear to me in yesterday's session, I might well have lost all of my children in this encounter, so I understand particularly keenly the risks you and Atsushi-dono mean. That is for another meeting, however. Not for this."

"Atsushi-dono, how much of this hallucination that's been reported did you see?" Tokutarou turned his gaze on the Eleventh Captain, who frowned, dashing his tears away roughly as though ashamed of himself for allowing a crack to appear in his usually formidable armour.

"All of it," he said frankly. "As did anyone else within the vicinity, I imagine."

"Of those here present, Hirata-dono is the only one who witnessed it," Midori pointed out. "Retsu-sama was the only other Council member in Inner Seireitei at the time, but it appears that the chimera did not break through the heavy barriers of protective Kidou placed over the Fourth Division on our departure. Retsu-sama, Keitarou's sword did not reach into Fourth either, correct?"

"That is correct," Retsu inclined her head sagely. "We were cocooned from the attack, but as a consequence, were not party to Kohaku-kun's illusion."

"Which leaves Hirata-dono as the sole Council witness," Midori nodded. "As I thought. The rest of us were in the Real World, or away from Inner Seireitei. My own adjutant was undertaking his own... manoeuvres, and also did not witness it. As a result, I have not had a complete report of its contents, simply the bare bones. But I understand from several different sources what was transmitted. As you witnessed it too, Atsushi-dono, how much of it was truth?"

Atsushi was silent for a moment, and Hirata wondered if the man would answer at all. Then he lowered his head, more to hide his expression than out of a gesture of submission.

"All of it," he spoke reluctantly, as though admitting such a thing reopened the old wounds once again and laid him vulnerable and exposed before his superiors. "It was entirely truth, Midori-sama. To my shame, I can deny nothing."

"Kohaku's power is significant indeed," Nagesu murmured, and Kyouki nodded her head.

"So it would seem," she said pensively, "but I will not hear a word said against him, Nagesu-dono. After hearing Juushirou and Shunsui speak for him yesterday, I am convinced that I should be his ally, not his enemy. My younger son and daughter may have fought one another to the death of one or both if not for that child's interference. Whatever his heritage, I believe the Council are correct to have heard and abided by Juushirou's plea for clemency."

"We will speak to the boy, when he is fit and able, but we will not punish him. So we have already decided," Nagesu agreed. "I am sick of the divisions within my family, and I seek to close all of them through whatever means are available to me. Keitarou's son has shown himself sympathetic to shinigami, and so I will not consider him in the way I must view his father. You needn't worry, Kyouki-dono. I am not regretting the Council's decision to stay the kill on sight order. Rather, like yourself, with a night's sleep, I feel more confident in our having made it. I believe Kohaku's actions have allowed us to open up and adjudge events we might not otherwise have been able to see."

"I think Atsushi-dono would rather we had not been able to do so,"

Tokutarou murmured, and Atsushi frowned, raising his head to gaze at the head of the Kyouraku. Slowly, he shook his head.

“The truth is what it is,” he said simply. “I am not afraid of being punished for my actions. I lied, and I concealed important evidence. If I had not, then perhaps things would have worked differently.”

His gaze flitted to Hirata, and resignation flooded his gaze once more.

“Hirata-sama will bear witness to it, even if I do not speak it aloud,” he said regretfully. “There was another reason for my reticence, and one I had hoped not to acknowledge, but I cannot hide from it. A large part of my reason for concealing Kusakawa’s true intent was... because I didn’t want to bring grief to the remaining members of the Twelfth. In particular...”

“Mareiko,” Nagesu’s eyes widened in surprise, and Atsushi nodded his head.

“Then, Sekime and I were friends,” he said honestly. “We have not been these twenty five years, mostly by my actions, but then, we were. I chose to confront Kusakawa in the Rukon because I wanted to do it in a way that would not hurt her... and to make sure that she was not involved. When he died... I realised that it would hurt her more to know how much he had betrayed her. He was dead, and so the incidents ceased. I thought... Mokizuki and I thought... it would be best left alone. It was enough of a burden for Mareiko to bear, seeing her Captain dead, without...”

He trailed off, and Kyouki let out a low whistle.

“I see,” she murmured, and at the expression on her face, Atsushi’s sallow cheeks reddened slightly. “True enough, Kusakawa’s death prevented him facing trial. Twelfth were spared that shame.”

“But ultimately that decision was wrong, too,” Atsushi said evenly. “The truth has come out, and it is just as painful now as it was then. I have protected nobody — and deferred justice.”

“Sekime was also a victim of Keitarou’s sword, I believe?” Yuuuchi asked, and Atsushi hesitated for a moment, before nodding his head.

“Yes, sir,” he agreed softly. “She came to attack me, but that boy’s illusions put a stop to it. The vision was... a big shock to her. It upset her badly... even now, I believe she was fond of her Captain’s memory.”

“Mareiko only agreed to become Captain of Twelfth because of her admiration for Shougo-dono,” Nagesu agreed gravely. “He did much for her, and she adored him. She felt it was all she could do to continue his work alongside the Urahara Clan, even though she did not believe herself worthy of the promotion. She couldn’t have known how twisted his true intentions were... I imagine of everyone, the shock has been greatest for her to bear.”

“It is a heavy weight for everyone,” Guren said frankly. “But as Minaichi rightly said, it is the way of war. We are all wounded, but we are here and we must go on. So must Sekime — or rescind the Twelfth Captaincy in favour of someone who can take on the role.”

“You won’t take away Sekime’s Captaincy because of my actions, surely?” Minaichi’s composure was shattered by this final implication, and Hirata saw desperation glitter in the man’s dark eyes. “She doesn’t deserve... she’s hurt because...”

“No Captaincies will be revoked by us, Atsushi-dono,” Nagesu shook his head. “Guren-sama means that this is a decision and a situation for Mareiko to face herself, and to decide whether she still wishes to continue in her current role. I will be grieved indeed if she chooses to resign, but I will allow it, if she feels unable to carry on with her duties. In the meantime, Michihashi is a solid, sound Vice Captain and capable of keeping the rest of the division in order whilst she comes to terms with everything. We are not here to punish the innocent.”

Atsushi took a heavy breath into his body to steady himself, and Hirata pursed his lips, realising that the claims Kusakawa had made in Kohaku’s illusion had been founded in more than just rumour.

Minaichi was in love with Sekime then, and still is now.

His eyes narrowed behind his glasses.
He’s distanced himself from her since Sakanoue’s death, because he knew he was responsible for the death of her Captain, but even so, deep beneath all of his harsh words and military discipline, he’s in love with her.

Out loud he said,

“Perhaps the best person to discuss that with Sekime is Atsushi-dono himself.”

“Hirata-sama?” Atsushi stared at him blankly, and Hirata shrugged his shoulders.

“Sekime deserves to hear from you, directly, the fate of her Captain and what he did,” he said quietly. “Otherwise there is no closure for either of you, and, as Captains of neighbouring divisions, that state of affairs suits the Gotei not at all.”

“Captains...?” Atsushi touched the edge of his haori absently, then, “I had assumed that my rank would be revoked as a result of this meeting, given that I have concealed so much, and acted in such a violent, vigilante way...”

“In your own words, you killed a Hollow, who Kusakawa created,” Hirata said softly. “I saw what nobody else here did, and so I know that, even faced with Kusakawa’s jibes and provocation, you made it clear to him your intent to arrest him and bring him before Seireitei justice. You did not intend to kill him. The defensive skill your sword has is a dangerous one, but no shinigami who witnessed that encounter could judge you guilty of murder. Many shinigami outside of the Council did see it, in part or in full, and it will probably be much talked of. That’s unavoidable. But whilst the Council wish to know the exact truth... I don’t suppose we are voting on whether to remove you from your position in Eleventh.”

“As with Mareiko, it’s a matter of whether you wish to keep your position, now everyone in Seireitei knows your secrets?” Nagesu eyed Atsushi quizzically, and the other man sighed, massaging his brow with his index fingers as though trying to stave off a sudden headache.

“I am Captain of the Eleventh until such time as death or disgrace makes it otherwise,” he said at length. “I am subject to your justice, not my own. I will remain in post. Whatever these revelations bring me, within or without my Division, I shall do my best to shut them out and to continue in a vein that will not shame my family or my position. Heiji would expect that of me... he died a soldier, and so will I.”

“Then I think Hirata’s advice is the best,” Midori reflected. “When she can receive visitors, you ought to visit Sekime and talk to her, honestly, about her Captain. Even if she doesn’t want to hear it, she ought to. Kusakawa’s life was forfeit — it was taken in less than ideal circumstances, but as far as I am concerned, justice was served and the matter over. You killed a felon, Minaichi, and by doing so, protected the lives of several innocents within the Rukon. What you have lived with since, only you know — but you have continued to do your duty regardless. For me, there is no judgement to pass. If anything, you were too eager to bring him back. A man guilty of as many sins as that should not expect to live, nor should you have aimed to allow him to.”

“Midori-sama!” Nagesu’s eyes widened, and Midori offered her neighbour a flinty smile.

“At long last, Aizen Keitarou, who hurt so many people, is dead,” she said matter-of-factly. “Whilst it might be a matter of personal grief to you, Nagesu-dono, to the rest of us it is evidence that, sometimes, legislative court justice is a hindrance, not a help. Had we taken him prisoner, keeping him that way would have been challenging, and holding a trial near impossible. Nobody has contested Kyouraku Shunsui’s actions as being anything but appropriate. In this light, I believe Minaichi’s actions in Rukongai entirely acceptable, if overly lenient. Courts and judgements are positive endeavours, but not in all cases. Sometimes, the old fashioned ways are best.”

Nagesu’s expression became unreadable, then he sighed, turning his gaze to the Captain who still huddled on the ground before them.

“The Council’s judgement is over, and it seems we find no guilt in your quarter, Atsushi-dono,” he said wearily. “You are dismissed.”

“Come in, Shizuka,”

Shunsui raised his gaze, and Shizuka took a hesitant step forward into the Eighth Division Captain’s office, chewing on her lip hard enough to taste blood. Although he had spent much of the previous day and night away from his native barracks, Shunsui had returned to his home roost that afternoon and, after closeting himself away with his Third and Fourth Seated officers, had, on Sora’s return from Ninth, instructed her to summon Shizuka and bring her to his office to discuss her recent conduct. In some regards, waiting for the axe to fall had been worse than it actually falling, but now, standing before him, she could feel the tension climbing notch by notch and she fervently wished herself as far from here as possible, in the safety of Riri’s village home or the patrol camp she had so defiantly snubbed.

For a moment her dark eyes met Shunsui’s identical brown ones, then lowered, her cheeks flushing an uncomfortable red at what she saw there. She faltered, unsure of what to do, and at her back she felt Sora’s hand between her shoulderblades, giving her a little nudge forward.

“Your Captain summoned you, Magaki-juuseki,” she said softly, her words light and unaccusing, but her formality of address reminding the young shinigami of her position. “You know how you ought to behave — there’s no skulking in corners in Eighth, as well you know.”

“Yes, Fukutaichou,” Shizuka’s lips moved in a crestfallen murmur, but she obediently took another step forward, dropping down before Shunsui’s position and bowing her head low in apology. “Magaki Shizuka, sir, reporting.”

“Reporting, huh...” Shunsui’s voice trailed off, and out of the corner of her eye, she saw him gesture to Sora to shut the door behind them. This the Vice Captain did, and Shizuka heard the sound of her superior leaning up against the wood. Whether she was preventing Shizuka from escaping, or anyone else from entering, the Tenth Seat was not sure, but it did not make the heavy atmosphere in the chamber any easier to bear.

At length, Shunsui spoke again.

“Look at me, Magaki-juuseki,” he commanded evenly, and Shizuka raised her head, cheeks blazing now. Even at his crosstest, Shunsui had never addressed her with such formality, unless in jest, but there were no jokes in the dark eyes today, simply a clouded, unreadable expression that told the young woman nothing about what lay ahead. Though meeting his gaze was hard, she knew that if she looked away, she would only make her situation worse, and so she gathered her courage, taking a deep breath to steady her nerves.

“Well?” Shunsui arched an eyebrow. “I’m sure there’s a fine explanation as to why you are currently here, in my office, rather than out on patrol in the wilds of the Districts. I am fairly certain you were assigned to a patrol under the command of a superior officer, who may well be missing your skills and ability through your failure to follow orders. I have not had full reports, yet, from the dispatched forces still away from Inner Seireitei — but I know that your name was included on those personnel lists, because I put it there myself. I’m sure I told you in explicit language when you came to see me what I considered your responsibility to be. In spite of that, here you are. If you have something to say in your defence, I’d like to hear it.”

Shizuka swallowed hard, the uncharacteristically stern note in Shunsui’s normally genial tones tearing through the layers of her composure. If it continued, she knew that she would cry and humiliate herself before both her Captain and Vice Captain, so she fought valiantly against the swell of emotions, taking a moment to pull her thoughts together before attempting to speak.

“I’m sorry, sir,” she said softly. “I have... no really good explanation for my conduct. I just... thought...”

“You thought to override my orders, regardless of the manner in which I gave them?”

“I...”

“Do you understand why it was I sent you and everyone away from Eighth Division?” Shunsui broke across her stuttered response, his expression challenging her to muster an adequate defence. “I’m sure you do, because you’re not stupid. I told you I intended on clearing the Division. Eighth has a responsibility to the Districts, but most of all, I wanted as many of my lower ranked officers in a place of relative safety where they could undertake useful activities, some short term, and others further from home. The reasons for that decision were none of your business. Your responsibility was to obey the instruction you were given. As Tenth Seated officer of the Eighth Division, you have a certain position of authority over the lower ranked officers, and you hold that rank despite the fact you are younger than some of those who rank beneath you. I have never had cause to question my choice to place you there, before — but now I wonder if it was wise.”

“Shunsui, that’s harsh,” Sora’s words were chiding, but they gave Shizuka little comfort, and she sniffed, struggling to keep back the tears before the onslaught of Shunsui’s displeasure.

“Is it harsh?” Shunsui met Sora’s gaze over his subordinate’s shoulder, a question in his expression. “By her own admission, Magaki-juuseki derelicted her duty, abandoned her post and, as far as I can gather, ran recklessly around Seireitei, potentially putting herself in considerable danger. Her finding and helping Koku is immaterial — she could have drawn attackers to her, become a hostage, or created any kind of complication in a very dangerous situation. Given that, is it harsh to speak bluntly? A Tenth Seated officer ought remember her position and her responsibilities, not run off on her own whims.”

His gaze returned to Shizuka, whose body was now trembling from head to foot.

“When you came to see me, I told you to be an adult and do your duty by those who you swore to protect,” he said softly. “Your family... Riri, Inori-kun... people like them. That’s why you came here, isn’t it? To be a shinigami, and protect the people back home from the danger posed by Hollows?”

Shizuka sniffed again, swallowing the lump in her throat. Slowly, wordlessly, she shook her head.

“N... no sir.” she murmured, her words uneven. “That’s not... I didn’t... I mean... I did... but...”

“In a sentence, if you please. You know enough words to be able to put them together in the right order.”

“Shunsui...” Sora’s words held a faint reproach, but Shunsui ignored them, his gaze fixed on the young girl, whose tears had begun to trickle silently down her cheeks. She shook her head again.

"I didn't... become a shinigami... just because I wanted to protect R... Riri-nee and Inori-nii," she spoke slowly and haltingly, her voice catching in her throat. "I did want to protect them, because they are family to me, and I love them. But I... I c... came here because... I... wanted... I... wanted to be..."

She swallowed, hard, unable to finish the sentence, and a gentle hand dropped down on her shoulder.

"Take a deep breath," Sora's voice was gentle. "You have time. Breathe and then say what you want to say. Shunsui brought you here to hear you out, so say whatever it is you need to say. Nobody will punish you until you've had a fair hearing, but if you don't speak up, we can't understand your motives for breaking rules."

"Sora, don't be soft on her," Shunsui sounded annoyed, his voice uncharacteristically on edge. "This is a disciplinary meeting, it isn't a family gathering. Magaki-juuseki broke a direct instruction, in complete defiance of my authority, and the consequences of it could have been extremely serious. Given that fact..."

"I wanted to be close to you," Shizuka's words blurted out at that moment, stopping Shunsui dead in his tracks, and for a moment he just stared at the young girl, unable to comprehend what he had just heard. Tears streaming down her cheeks now, Shizuka took shaky breaths of air into her lungs, reaching up her sleeve to wipe her eyes.

"I'm sorry I disobeyed you," she said slowly, her voice shaking as she struggled to speak through the tears. "I know it was reckless and stupid, and wrong. I know that I did something terrible, and I deserve to be punished. Even demoted. I won't fight against any punishment you give me, because I know what I did was foolish and in defiance of my duty. I just... I don't really have a way to defend my reasons why. I can't even explain it to myself. I just felt... that something was wrong."

"Even more reason to do as your Captain instructs, surely?" Sora asked quietly, and Shizuka nodded, swallowing hard.

"Yes," she agreed, "I know, but I wasn't... thinking like that. I was... afraid, but not... of being attacked. I was afraid of... of being sent away... and... and... if Taichou was k... killed... I'd never s... see him again, and... I d... didn't... I wanted... to be here. I know it was wrong, but I didn't... want to... be sent away because I was frightened that... Taichou was sending us away because... he... was going... t...

to fight... and... and d... die.”

“You thought what?” Now Shunsui was completely floored, his earlier sternness shattered in light of his young member’s admission, and Shizuka raised a hopeless gaze to his.

“I came to Eighth because of you,” she murmured. “You said that I swore to protect my family, and I did, but that family... it includes you. I... can’t think of it any other way, even if you tell me to — I can’t. I... I did something stupid, and I’m sorry. I’m really sorry. But even if it’s stupid and I know that I can’t, I wanted to... to make sure you were safe. Because you... are my family too.”

Shunsui stared at her for a moment, then he groaned, reaching up his hand to rub his brow. For a moment he didn’t speak, then,

“Sora, how am I supposed to respond to that?” he asked plaintively. “I’m attempting to be a firm, disciplining Captain, and yet she comes out with something like that... what am I meant to do to hold my authority, when a slip of a girl is telling me that she broke rules because she wanted to protect me?”

“I’d say she needs to do a bit more work in the sword arena if she’s going to reach that level of skill,” To Shizuka’s surprise, Sora sounded amused, rather than put out, and Shunsui grimaced, shaking his head. “It’s your loss, Shunsui. I told you, Shizu-chan isn’t the defiant type, not usually. True, her reason was reckless, but there was a reason. And more, you have blame in it too. If you go around like a bear with a sore head, keeping secrets from your subordinates and sending them away with half-truths, it’s a recipe for disaster. There are enough imaginative members of Eighth to start a mutiny, if you’re not careful.”

“Are you taking her side?” Shunsui demanded, a hurt look on his face, and Sora chuckled, shaking her head.

“No, I’m just stating it as it is,” she said comfortably. “You’re a good Captain, but sometimes, a hopeless communicator. You came in in a strop, and shut yourself away. Of course people are going to worry. I’m used to your idiocy, and I’ve worked around it for years — I tend to trust in it, because even when it’s reckless, usually the results are the right ones. But Shizuka’s young, impulsive, and more tied to you than I am. If you get your head sliced off your body, I’d like to think I’m capable of sweeping away the resultant mess and pushing Eighth on, even if it means trampling over your grave to get there. Shizuka is different, though. Of everyone in Eighth — maybe you owed her some kind of explanation. At least, an assurance that you weren't going out to die."

Shunsui pressed his lips together for a moment, then he sighed.

"I didn't know if I was or wasn't," he owned. "I didn't know the outcome of my fight, only that I had to fight it, and if I could, I had to win. I knew that winning meant killing Kohaku's father. Even though I don't suppose I've ever hated anyone as much as I hated that man, Kohaku is a different matter. This was a man he loved... I knew that, when he spoke to me, even as he was telling me that I was the only one who could do it, and if I wanted to save Seireitei, I must. Now, I've blood on my hands and my blade, metaphorically if not physically. Preparing for that eventuality was enough to be going on with, without inviting Shizuka — or anyone else — to my chamber for a quick run-down of the next day's plan of action."

"No, but you should've understood Shizuka's own feelings," Sora said matter-of-factly. "She shouldn't have defied you and stayed here in secret, that was wrong and if you'll let me, I'll find some new and exciting punishments to make sure she doesn't forget that, next time, Taichou's orders are absolute. But... given the particular circumstances of this... I think you should have let her stay behind. It's not nice, when there's blood involved. Fighting Haku-nii, that wasn't pleasant for me... but I'd rather have been there, facing and fighting him than sent away somewhere, wondering what was going on."

She paused for a moment, then,

"Seeing Ryuusei-nii yesterday evening was a bigger shock than having to meet Haku-nii's blade, and I felt guilty, because I hadn't given the Real World a thought," she admitted. "I should have done — I should've realised what Shizuka did — that it might have been the last time I saw my brother, or my mother, or my nephew, but I didn't. That was my bad... I'm just lucky that they came back alive and that, even despite its severity, Ryuusei-nii's injury hasn't turned out to be fatal. It might've been a different story. Okaasama said last night that she might've lost all three of her children in this business, and it hit home, when she said it. I might've lost my whole family, too. Given that... I understand how Shizuka feels. Riri-san, Inori-kun... they're not here. They're far away, and probably, quite safe from harm. You, on the other hand... were preparing to throw yourself into danger. And Shizuka is more sensitive than I am. Doubtless she realised sooner than I did how you were planning to act... she seems to have inherited that trait."

"Inherited, huh," Shunsui looked rueful, his gaze flitting to Shizuka, who was fighting desperately to gain control of the tears that still insisted on falling. “Maybe you’re right, though I still think this was one of those situations where a firm hand was necessary. Shizuka, in case you haven’t realised, there are people here in Eighth who care about you, too. Not just me, but others — people who consider you part of the team, and who would’ve been grieved to bury you. My life would not be worth living, either, if I’d had to report back to Riri that you’d ended up carved into pieces. This was a dangerous situation, with a dangerous enemy... it could’ve ended differently, and I might not have been able to protect you.”

He tilted his head on one side, considering.

“I admit I didn’t give you all much explanation of what to expect, though,” he conceded at length. “I didn’t tell you the level of danger involved, and I should have. Maybe if I had, you’d have understood my orders more clearly. And we wouldn’t be having this conversation.”

Shizuka closed her eyes briefly, finally regaining control of her composure, and she shook her head.

“I don’t care what punishment you give me,” she said honestly. “You came back alive, and Sora-dono and Tetsuya-dono both did too, and Eighth didn’t lose anyone, and so... even if I have to scrub out the latrines for six months together, I don’t care. My family is still in one piece... so... so it’s all all right. Even if you send me back to being a recruit, I won’t mind.”

Shunsui got to his feet, moving towards her and resting a hand on her head.

“You should watch it, though, if Sora’s right about your intuition,” he said warningly. “It can get you into more trouble than you might imagine.”

He grasped her hand, pulling her gently to her feet, and before she knew what she was doing, Shizuka flung her arms around him, burying her head in her companion’s thick pink haori.

“Shizu...?”

“I’m glad you’re safe,” Shizuka’s voice was muffled by the fabric, and she did not release her hold. “I’m really glad, Shunsui-nii. But I wish you hadn’t’ve had to kill Koku-kun’s father. If it had been the other way around... I don’t really know Koku-kun yet, but I guess... even if his father was as bad a criminal as people say, it must hurt to know he’s dead.”

“Yes, I think it probably does,” Shunsui relented, detaching the young woman’s hold and holding her at arm’s length, meeting her gaze with a pensive one of his own. “He asked me, he showed me, he led me down the path to do it, but I don’t think that means he wanted it to happen the way it did. It was the only way to prevent the deaths of many, many people, and so he made a choice — but that choice has personal repercussions for him and I feel bad that it’s the case.”

“Which is why you’ve left him in Juushirou’s hands, and come back to wreak havoc here instead,” Sora deduced astutely. Shunsui nodded.

“Even though it was Koku’s request, I don’t feel ready to meet him face to face, yet,” he said gravely. “He deserves time to grieve and adjust without seeing his father’s killer lurking around in the shadows. It’s not my place to be right now — and Juu is far better at dealing with such things than me, anyway. Koku trusts Juushirou, and Juushirou will make sure the Council doesn’t lay a finger on the lad. I hate to admit that Juu’s belief in Koku was sound... there’s no doubt that, without his insight and his help, we would’ve been in a far worse position. Maybe even overrun.”

Shizuka was silent for a moment, then she raised her gaze to her companion.

“I realise I’m going to have a lot of icky extra duties for the foreseeable future,” she said hesitantly, “but I wondered if you’d mind if, after that, I... if I went to Thirteenth, and saw him in your place?”

“Koku?” Shunsui was taken aback, and Shizuka nodded.

“I found him, and I’d like to see that he’s really all right,” she agreed. “More, though, he’s lost so many things. When I heard his whole story, it made me sad. I know that, if Riri-nee hadn’t taken Inori-nii and I in, we would’ve probably been left to starve... nobody cares much about the children of prostitutes, and if I hadn’t met Riri-nee, I would never have met you or Sora-dono, or understood who I was or what I was meant to do with my life. Inori-nii and I weren’t abandoned, even though in some ways we lost family. Koku-kun has lost all of his family now, hasn’t he? He’s sacrificed all those things to make sure we don’t die, even though most of us he doesn’t even know. I think... I should at least go once. It seems right... that it’s me, if it’s not you.”

“That intuition again,” Sora rolled her eyes. “Let her go, Shunsui. She’s right, in any case. She did find the lad, and I doubt Juushirou will mind if she pays a house call. She’s there enough, anyway, training with Ketsui, so nobody will bat an eyelid if she does.”

"I suppose that's true," Shunsui acknowledged. "All right. Your punishment is in Sora's hands, Shizu, and make sure you do exactly as she instructs you, however horrible and outlandish it proves to be. Moreover, if you think you can protect me, I'll be taking you to task with Katen Kyoukotsu myself, and we'll see just how confident you really are of fighting off my enemies for me. If you have any free time after all of that, though, by all means, go to Thirteenth. When things have settled some, go see the lad, and see Ketsui, too. Tenichi's hearing will probably happen as soon as the red tape over Ninth and the aftermath of Keitarou's uprising is laid to rest, and he'll probably need a friend's moral support, too."

"I'd already planned to be that," Shizuka assured him, relief glittering in her expression. "I'll do as you say this time, Taichou, I promise. Everything, exactly as you said it."

"Well, if you do, it will probably be a first," Shunsui pulled a face at her. "Go on with you. Run, while you still can — who knows when the next time you'll see daylight will be, given Sora's propensity for innovative punishments!"

The swirling remnants of reiryoku had begun to drift away over Seireitei, blown and scattered by the morning breeze and casting a surreal hush over the whole of the surrounding area.

For a while, everything was silent, but then the hiss of the door sliding back made Kohaku open his eyes, his blurry gaze darting towards the black and white clad figure that now stood there, a tray in her hand. At his movement, she grinned, moving towards him and setting the tray down at the bedside.

"Breakfast," she said matter-of-factly, and Kohaku shivered, closing his eyes and turning his head away.

"I'm not hungry."

"You are hungry," Kirio sat down on the side of the bed, folding back the blankets that he had pulled up to his chin and gazing down on him with a sigh. "Edogawa-san says so, and she knows what she's talking about better than you. Besides, I took a message to Third, earlier, and I saw what you did to the Senkaimon. That kind of spirit blow-out takes it out of you, and Edogawa-san said all you've ingested since then is herbs to sleep and sugar-water. Maybe they helped calm you down, but it's not enough. She had to go back to Fourth this morning, to help with the injured from the Real World, but she was quite firm about you and Taichou supported her orders. You need to eat something, and I volunteered for the job of making you.”

She indicated the bowl on the tray.

“It’s only porridge. Bland and gentle, and easy to swallow.”

“I told you. I’m not hungry.”

“And I told you, you are,” Kirio sighed, reaching out to grasp her young companion by the shoulders. Before Kohaku knew what was going on, she had hauled him forcibly up into a sitting position, amusement glittering in her gaze as she took in his look of bewilderment. “Yes, just because I’m a girl doesn’t mean I’m not stronger than you and right now you wouldn’t be able to fight with your shadow. You know, you’re the current hot topic of gossip among the lower ranks all over Seireitei. Since Taichou and Kyouraku-taichou’s encounter with the Council, everyone’s somehow heard about it and the whole of Seireitei is buzzing with rumours about you and the mad hallucination you made us all see. What do you suppose they’d all think if they knew their saviour was huddling beneath blankets refusing to eat like a sulky child, huh? Stop being silly... else I’ll have to force-feed you, and that won’t be fun for either of us.”

“Force... feed?” Kohaku blinked, then shook his head. “I’m no saviour. People died, Kirio-san. I knew they would, if I did the things I did. I knew that my father would be one of them. It was Kyourakudono who saved people. Not me. I vandalised the Senkaimon... that’s all.”

He closed his eyes before Kirio could see the tears that threatened to well up in their depths.

“I betrayed my father, too,” he murmured. “I didn’t know any other way to stop him, but I let him die. I let him be killed. That makes me a bad person and an even worse son. I knew what would happen and I did nothing about it. I don’t deserve to be called a saviour, and you shouldn’t waste time fussing over me.”

“Are you trying to starve yourself on purpose?” Kirio’s expression became one of shock and dismay, and Kohaku shrugged.

“I’m not trying to do anything,” he replied sadly. “You have other things more important than fussing over me, and you should do those things.”

He eyed her suspiciously.

“Why are you so bright and cheerful, anyway?” he demanded warily. “I lied to you. I lied to you over and over again about who I was and where I came from. Why aren't you angry with me? I don't understand... why don't you hate me, now you know who I really am?"

"Your real name doesn't matter much to me," Kirio settled herself down comfortably beside the bed, and Kohaku groaned inwardly, knowing that whatever he said, she had no intention of leaving until she had achieved her initial goal. "If we come to it, Koku, you don't know my real name either. Names aren't important. Nor are parents. It's what we do. And I know — Taichou told all of us — what you did. You might think that it was just breaking a Senkaimon, but when you did that, you freed all the people under Keitarou's control and you made sure that nobody else could come back and get hurt. You might not think it a great thing, not right now, but it was. Even if you lied to me... it doesn't matter. You had a good reason... and I respect that."

"What do you mean, I don't know your real name?" Kohaku stared, momentarily taken off guard, and Kirio chuckled at his dumbfounded expression.

"I told you," she chided lightly. "I was taken in by kind people who treated me as their own. Hikifune is their name. It isn't the name I was born with. I let go of that self a long time ago... and nobody here knows me as anything else."

"Because your family abandoned you?" Kohaku asked softly, seeing his companion's eyes soften in comprehension at his question. Slowly she nodded.

"My family is here," she said honestly. "I was Hikifune Kirio when I became a shinigami. I was Hikifune Kirio the first time I met Taichou, at the Academy, when I was twelve and my spirit power was scaring my adoptive family. I was Hikifune Kirio when I decided what I was going to do with my life. So I'm Hikifune Kirio, now. I don't remember my parents very clearly, I was so young when they died. I hope they'd be happy with what I've done, but I don't feel any ties to that time or that life. It doesn't matter. It's over and I've begun again."

"You never think about your brother and sister?" Kohaku did not know why he suddenly wanted to know the answer to this question, and Kirio cast him a searching look, causing him to redden and look away.

"I'm sorry. I'm asking personal questions and you probably don't want to answer them, not to someone who lied about his own past," he murmured, but Kirio shook his head.

"I see the parallel," she said gently. "I do, Koku, and that's why I volunteered to come here like this. I thought I might coax you to eat... and persuade you that even if everything looks dark right now, it won't always. The choices you made were hard ones — I won't pretend they weren't. The ones who did wrong, though, they were your parents, not you. It's hard and you feel guilty, you feel like you should've done something to change things... but you couldn't. All you could do was make sure the suffering stopped."

She sighed, shrugging her shoulders.

"I don't know if leaving me behind stopped my sister and brother from suffering, or if there was another reason we parted ways," she admitted sadly. "Edogawa-san told me that your brother has disappeared completely. She said she thought he'd cut ties with you for your own safety, and at least... even if you miss him, you know for sure he isn't gone because he stopped loving you. I never have had that. There probably was a reason — but it's difficult to stomach the idea that that reason might simply have been because I was me."

She reached over to squeeze Kohaku by the hand.

"Your spirit power alienated you, and mine might have alienated me from my real kin," she added. "In that, we're the same. So you can talk to me, and ask me questions as much as you like. If it helps you, I don't mind. I lost my little brother, and he was too young to decide whether we should be separated or not. Too young, maybe, to even remember me clearly... I don't know. You've lost your big brother, and so it's a good fit. I've always been an unofficial Oneesan where Ketsui's concerned, and now, I guess, that extends to you too. If you want it, of course. I know you think I'm interfering and pushy, but that's just who I am."

"No..." Kohaku hesitated, then moved his other hand to grasp her fingers loosely, managing a wan smile. "No, I... I don't want to be alone. You..have been kind to me. And I... I need that right now. I'm scared of where things have taken me. I knew that if I ever came to Seireitei, I'd never go back, but I thought I'd die when I damaged the Senkaimon. I didn't, though, and now I'm lost. I don't have anywhere or anyone else to turn to, just the people here. You, Ukitake-dono, Edogawa-san... that's all. I can't face Kyouraku-dono, not now I've made him do something so terrible. And my real family... are gone. They're gone forever. I won't ever get them back."

"Taichou said your mother was in Seireitei custody," Kirio pointed out, and Kohaku shook his head.

"Mother is gone, too," he said cryptically. "Even if she's here, and alive, she's gone. She wouldn't know me, not even if I stood before her. Father was her whole world — without him, she's got nothing left. Besides, I did that to her. I took him away from her... I'm not sure I could face her, knowing that."

He pulled back his hands, glancing at them for a moment, then,

"Will you tell me about your brother and sister? What you remember, if you can? If it hurts then you don't have to, but I think... I'd like to hear about them."

"It's hard for me to talk about my sister," Kirio admitted. "We spent a lot of time together — I followed her around like a lost kitten... almost literally tied to her apron strings. She was older... but really, only in her late teens when Mother and Father were killed in the purges in Seventh District. We fled and were in a refugee camp in Eighth District. I met Tenichi and Ketsui there, but I was too young, really, to understand what was really going on. I met your father then, too, once," she smiled ruefully. "I didn't know it, then, of course. I realised it much, much later. He was looking for Tenichi and Ketsui, but they'd already left. He gave me coins for helping him, so I thought he was a kind man."

"He was. Sometimes," Kohaku said softly, and Kirio nodded.

"My friend, Shikiki, spent some time with him as a small child. Like me, she lost her family in the purges," she reflected. "She's said that he was capable of being very kind, but that he was damaged and couldn't recover from the things that had happened to him. It makes me think that his dying now was the best way to save him, Koku. Even if it hurts you and your mother, he can start over afresh without all of that baggage and pain."

"I hope so," Kohaku managed another feeble smile. "Thank you for saying that. I want to believe in it, too... but it's too raw, right now, to really take in."

"Mm," Kirio looked thoughtful. "Some things fade, some don't. Some realities are harsh, but they help make you who you are and who you want to become in the future. They're sent to shape us, and it's up to us to make sure we don't let them destroy us. Your father's challenges were too big for him to really handle, and he buckled and lost his grip. You don't have to be like that, though. Not now you're here. You have Taichou looking out for you — rumours are that he stormed the Council and more or less threatened mutiny over your safety, but he's refused to confirm whether or not that's true. Either way, though, he went with a goal and he came back with it accomplished. Nobody's going to hurt you here, now — so you should let us help you in whatever way you can."

She smiled, gesturing to the porridge bowl, and Kohaku's gaze slid over towards it reluctantly.

"Kirio-san..."

"I'll tell you about my family, while you eat," Kirio said matter-of-factly. "I think it's a fair trade. I don't talk about them much, but I will — so I expect something in return. I won't let you fade away, Koku, and I know better than you the damage you can do to yourself if you don't refuel your body properly after using a lot of spirit power. If you died, then everything Taichou went to the Council for will be in vain. It would be selfish and then I'd be cross with you — so you eat, and I'll talk. Fair enough?"

Kohaku let out a heavy sigh, but he knew he was beaten, and he nodded, grudgingly holding out his hands to take the bowl. Kirio beamed, lifting the tray and placing it across the boy's lap.

"I need a spoon," Kohaku pointed out. "Did you forget to bring one of those?"

"Nope, I have two," Kirio produced the spoons with a smile, setting one down on the tray and nudging it across towards him encouragingly. "Just in case you threw the first one at me and I needed to resort to bully tactics. I might not be a healer, but I do know that it's not a good idea for an invalid to eat porridge with a spoon that's been tossed across the floor."

"I suppose I should be thankful for that, at least," Kohaku observed, and Kirio's beam widened.

"Eat slowly," she advised. "Edogawa-san says she thinks you're not hungry mostly because you've not been eating. When you begin, she thinks you'll start to feel your appetite again, and I'm sure she's right. She's a good healer and I've learned a lot from her... I trust her judgement when it comes to you, so I'm sure the porridge will help."

"I guess we'll see, but you'll probably be the one cleaning my room if it disagrees with me," Kohaku said wryly, sliding thin fingers around the stem of the spoon and picking it up cautiously. "I might be sick all over you. You ought to be prepared for that."

"You aren't going to scare me. You've thrown up enough times since you've been here and I'm a shinigami, not a schoolgirl," was Kirio's crushing rejoinder, and, suitably beaten, Kohaku reluctantly slid the tip of the spoon into the porridge, lifting it to his lips. It had cooled slightly in the time they had been talking, but Kirio had been right about the bland taste and despite his body's overall dizzy state, he found it did not trigger his nausea to swallow it. On the contrary, as he felt the slick substance slide down his gullet into his stomach, he felt the first twinges of hunger begin to gnaw away at him, as if the impulse to eat had been awoken from a deep slumber.

Kirio-san is right. My body needs food. Even in the Rukon, I could never get enough food. Father used to bring me what he could, but it was never enough. Katsu-nii used to tease me for eating everyone else's rations. Right now, there's food available, and my body's crying out for it. How could I not have noticed? Kirio-san's right.

His gaze flitted to where the gleaming sword lay beside the window, and his eyes narrowed, contemplating.

Is that thanks to you, Kyouka? I don't know whether I exhausted my power to a degree you haven't managed to recover from, yet, or whether it's because of what happened at that Gate, but I feel as though the worst of the delusions are gone now. Maybe you and I have begun to forge a tentative understanding... perhaps you're willing to let me recover my way, since I fought this battle your way. Well, I suppose you were right, and I wasn't going to die that day. I imagine you won't let me give up on living particularly easily, so maybe now, now you have a proper sword to live in and a true name I understand... maybe you'll help me to heal for real this time.

He took a second mouthful, aware that the shinigami's beady gaze was fixed on him firmly, and he sighed.

"I'm eating," he pointed out. "Your turn. A promise is a promise and I won't stop now I've begun."

"All right," Kirio sat back, folding her arms across her chest. "Well, like I told you, I came from Seventh District, but I spent some time in Eighth. After my sister and brother left me, I ended up in First. It was a miracle I lived, really. My sister... her name was Junko. She as very pretty. She had a lot of guys who thought so, but she always kept them at arm's length. She had us to look after, she'd always say. She was all we had, and I thought the world of her. She was my sister, but she might as well have been my mother. It's why I find it hard to imagine why she'd leave me... but I don't like to think she might be dead."

"Maybe, like Katsu-nii, it happened because she thought it would protect you somehow," Kohaku suggested, and Kirio snorted, shaking her head.

"I had no food nor shelter nor any way of obtaining them," she said categorically. "You don't abandon a child like that. Here, you're in the hands of people who will help you and you can trust us, I promise you can. I was on my own completely... you should be glad that we won't let you be that."

"You're angry at her," Kohaku observed, and Kirio nodded.

"I never let those feelings come through. I squash them and pretend they're not there, but they are," she admitted. "You're the first person I've talked about this with in a long time, though. It feels odd to be so open about what happened — but you're probably the best person to understand right now."

"Maybe," Kohaku reflected, "but if it's hard, you don't need to tell me any more about her. Tell me about your brother. If you made Ketsui-dono a substitute, and you're trying to do the same with me, you must miss him."

"I do," Kirio looked embarrassed. "I know he didn't choose us to be parted, and I wonder if he grew up and who he became. He was the cutest baby, Koku. He had the biggest green eyes and this mop of red hair and he got into everything he could yet had the most angelic smile imagineable. We used to play in the refugee hut, sometimes, when my sister was busy trying to obtain food. We'd get covered in dust, and he'd giggle and laugh and bat my hair. When we parted, he was only five years old, so I suppose when I think of him, that's how I see him, even though by now he'd be almost as old as Ketsui-kun. Where I followed Neechan, he used to follow me. His name was Haruhiko, but he couldn't say it properly, and nor could I, at first, so we always called him Hiko. It kind of stuck... Koku? What is it?"

For Kohaku had paused, spoon halfway to his lips at the sound of her words.

Hiko? Why do I feel like that name means something? Where have I heard it... felt it before? I should know, but I don't. Maybe it's nothing — maybe I don't really want to know.

Out loud he said,

"Maybe I could try and find out where they are. Your brother and sister, I mean — I could use my reiryoku and try and track your memories of them, see if I can bring forth an image of where they are now."

"You're eating porridge, you're not using more reiryoku when you haven't powered up," Kirio said sharply, shaking her head decisively. "I don't need to know. I know what you can do — I saw the chimera like everyone else — but I don't want you to do anything of the sort. Wherever they are, their lives and mine are separate now. If I don't know if they're dead, I don't know if they abandoned me. Not knowing the answer is difficult, but knowing it, at this late stage... I'd rather not. It means we'd be strangers, now, if we met — but like I told you, I have a family here and its a place I belong. I have Tenichi and Ketsui, too. It's fine. I don't want to know."

"If that's how you feel," Kohaku pursed his lips, but nodded. "There are lots of things I'd rather not have known or seen, so I suppose I understand. If you'd rather not know, I won't try and see. It just sounded as though you wondered, just for a moment."

"I'll always wonder, but it doesn't mean I want a firm answer," Kirio looked self-conscious. "It's not logical, but it's how I feel. It's easier this way, somehow. Too much time has passed."

She reached over to tap the side of the bowl with a grin. "And that wasn't so hard, was it? I knew when you began you'd keep going... and it'll do you good. Edogawa-san said that making you eat as much as you need right away would probably make you ill, since you're not used to quantities of nutritious food, but if you keep on like you've just begun, you'll feel much better before you know it."

"I can't argue," Kohaku admitted, setting the bowl down and pushing the tray aside with a rueful sigh. "I feel more hungry now than I did when I began eating, but I suppose that's a good sign."

"I think so," Kirio agreed. "Edogawa-san will be pleased. She was very worried about you."

"I'm good at making people worry," Kohaku looked guilty. "I'm not used to so many people being around, so I hadn't thought about them caring so much about what I do or whether I'm all right. I'm sorry. I'll try and remember, in future. I'm used to being on my own a lot, but I'm quite glad that that's not the case right now. I don't think I really want to spend much time with my own thoughts at the moment."

He cast Kirio a sidelong glance.

"Kirio-san, about Tenichi-dono...?"

"Tenichi?" Kirio started, then frowned. "What about him?"

"Is he going to be in a lot of trouble, for trying to kill the silver fox?"

"For trying to kill the what?" Kirio blinked, and Kohaku smiled ruefully.

“I don’t know her name,” he admitted. “A girl with silver hair and no voice. I know he tried to hurt her, and he was arrested because of it. Will he get in a lot of trouble for it?”

“Oh, Ichimaru-san,” Kirio rubbed her chin pensively. “I wish I knew. I hope not, but it’s hard to be sure. I’ve been to see him since he was arrested, but only for a brief spell and he wasn’t really talking about much. He didn’t seem much like himself, and he spent most of the time apologising to me for making me worry and asking whether Ketsui was all right. The Second Division have him, and I don’t know when they’re going to hold his hearing. There’s so much else to settle, so it’s been delayed.”

“Is there anything I can do to help him?”

“You?” Kirio stared, and Kohaku nodded his head.

“Ukitake-dono didn’t tell you that, then?” he asked, and Kirio’s eyes became slits of curiosity.

“Tell me... what?”

“I know what happened to Tenichi-dono in Rukongai,” Kohaku told her evenly. “I was assigned to watch him, after he was abducted. I know he wasn’t there because he wanted to be, and I know he wasn’t aware of the things Father was planning in Rukongai. Father used him and manipulated him and made him paranoid, so he did foolish things.”

Kirio’s eyes became huge, and Kohaku shrugged his shoulders.

“Twice, after he came here, he came to see me,” he continued. “He saw me, the day I first arrived, because he came to tell Ukitake-dono about Souja-dono’s death. I knew he’d been here, even though I was unconscious when he was — when I’ve felt someone’s reiatsu, I never forget it, not ever. I thought he would come, and he did. He wanted to know if I’d tell anyone about our acquaintance... and he was a bit desperate about what would happen if I did. Souja-dono’s death had frightened him, and I had to convince him it wasn’t his fault. Then one of Father’s agents was taken into Second’s custody, and I guess after that he began to fall apart. I tried to warn him to let it alone and walk away, but he wanted to protect Ketsui-dono, so I suppose he felt he couldn’t.”

He looked regretful.

“He attacked the silver fox girl because he thought she was a spy for my father. It was a mistake, and Ketsui-dono stopped it. He wasn’t working for Father, Kirio-san. I just... don’t know if there’s anything I can do to help him, or if having Keitarou's son as a witness would hurt his case."

"Why didn't you tell me about this before?" Kirio demanded, grabbing him by the shoulders, and Kohaku flinched, detaching himself carefully from her hold.

"I'm stiff," he scolded, then, "and I couldn't. You weren't supposed to know who I was. It was too dangerous... but now, if Ukitake-dono really has secured my safety..."

"I'll talk to Taichou. I'll ask him, see what he thinks," Kirio's eyes had lit up suddenly with hope, and despite himself, Kohaku felt a sense of warmth at her reaction. "If he says its a good idea, Koku, will you testify? Will you come tell the court whatever you know? I know Tenichi isn't a bad person, and I know he's done stupid things... but he's not a traitor and I don't... I don't want anyone to put him to death for making silly mistakes. He's not evil, he doesn't deserve that, and so if you can prove he wasn't Keitarou's ally, then will you? If Taichou agrees, will you?"

"I don't want Tenichi-dono to die, either," Kohaku assured her. "If I can help, Kirio-san, I will. You have my word."

He smiled faintly, glancing across towards Kyouka Raigen once more.

"If I'm going to live, I think the only way I'm going to get peace is to be proactive and take important decisions about things," he added. "This seems like a good place to start. I don't want to bring people death, Kirio-san, so if I can help save Tenichi-dono's life, then, well, that's what I'll have to do."

75. Olive Branch

Chapter Seventy Three : Olive Branch

Nagesu stood at the window of his office, resting his hands on the sill with a sigh as he watched the sky change colours, the dark indigos and mauves of the departing night paling and brightening into the azure sheen of the morning. It was going to be another bright, sunny day over Seireitei. Only the barest wisps of cloud broke up the wide stretch of warm colour, but, as he gazed across in the direction of the Rukongai wall, he almost thought he could see the heavy hazed skyline that cloaked the sun from view on the other side of the divide. Such separate worlds, and yet, maybe not.

He turned, his gaze resting on the piles of documents that littered his desk. He had not slept much since the return from the Real World, the burden of guilt for the decisions made weighing more heavily on his shoulders than he would have liked. Reviewing Shougo's records with a fine tooth comb had unlocked secret after secret, and though it had pained him to read, Nagesu had forced himself to go through everything, reading and understanding all the facets of his kinsman's treason.

There had been no flaws in the man's demeanour, he reflected bitterly, moving to sit back down behind his desk and reaching for the uppermost documentation, scanning over it once again. Both Shougo and Daigo before him had played their roles to perfection, escaping from the scandal of Keitsune's disgrace and learning from it enough to conceal their own experiments. It had been Daigo who had created the three creatures the shinigami had faced and fought, and, once the chaos in Seireitei had begun to calm, Nagesu had sent Yunosuke and Shiketsu with a group of men to retrieve the three corpses for further scientific study.

Their identities were no longer a mystery, and as he brushed his fingers across the aged document to smooth it, the fading ink characters seemed to jump out at him.

Nakamoto Haruya. Nakamoto Aki.

Siblings convicted of rebellion and uprising, imprisoned and sentenced to death for their crimes more than a hundred years earlier. Each death warrant had been signed by Daigo's own looping hand and confirmed by Nagesu's father's seal, yet the sentence had never been carried out. Daigo had not killed them, but had taken them to use as his experiments and, for more than a century, they had been at his mercy, and then that of his son as their bodies and minds were warped and broken in the name of spirit science. Shougo had used Rukongai's spiritually touched souls to try and replicate his father's work, but all he had succeeded in doing was destroying his subjects and turning them into crazed Hollows — ending with Sakanoue Heiji, and, by a tragic twist of fate, Anabomi Seizuku. It had begun a long long time ago, and Nagesu had no way of knowing how many lives it had cost.

Haruya and Aki's death warrants were not the only ones included in the files. There had been other felons, those with suitable bloodline and spirit power, who had been taken in much the same way. Whilst these were convicted as traitors, therefore beyond the help of law, Nagesu knew better than most how strict and paranoid his Father had become in his later years, and how many of the 'treasonable' offences had in reality been quite minor. Nagesu was too fair-minded an individual not to feel that even the worst criminals would not have deserved so many years of torture — and the feeling was compounded by the list of failures who, according to Daigo's diary, had died in similar horrific circumstances to Sakanoue and Anabomi along the way. Haruya and Aki had survived the procedure, but they were not the only victims of the Kusakawa family's ambition, and this fact alone made Nagesu feel physically sick.

Guren-sama reported that the one he fought... Haruya... said they were illegitimate children of the Clan. What better subjects for experimentation than children with power in their blood who nobody wanted? My father's regime encouraged shameful things indeed... though, thank goodness, I can't find any indication that he supported such experiments. Horrendous as this all is, at least I can take comfort in the fact that he too was fooled by Daigo-dono and his son, and not complicit in their work.

As for the third figure, identifying him had proven more difficult. Guren had recalled Haruya using the name "Moe", but there had been no warrant under that name in the files. Daigo's diary too had mentioned a "Moe", but the name had been written in phonetic characters and no clues to his original identity had been forthcoming. It had taken him the best part of the night, and he had been on the verge of giving up, when, moving some of Daigo's books off his desk, he had dislodged two or three sheets of thin paper, sending them tumbling to the floor. Bending to pick them up, he had realised they were letters, and, as he had read the contents of the first, his heart had almost stopped in his chest.

Moe had not been a criminal. He had not even been an illegitimate son. He had been an infant born too soon, an imperfect child in an overly perfect Clan world. His father had discarded him, and Daigo had taken advantage.

Urahara Kizashi.

Nagesu drew a deep breath into his body to calm himself.

To think, his father was at my court until his death, fifteen years ago. To think he was respected, when all the time, he kept such a secret. He told everyone his son Kizashi died in infancy... but it was a lie. Did he know what Daigo-dono did to the boy, or did he simply pay him to take away a child he considered an embarrassment? How could a father act so, to his own flesh and blood?

His mind flitted to his own son and daughters, and involuntarily he shivered at the thought of any of them going through the same set of ordeals.

I could not do it. I could not look at a child of mine and turn my back on him or her, no matter how challenged their life might have been. A father who does such a thing is hardly a man, and yet I can do nothing for Kizashi now. I cannot help him and I cannot punish his father. All I have are empty regrets and belated understanding. My family is riddled with ambition, deceit and corruption, crumbling from the inside out. It did not begin with Keitarou, and nor, I am sure, will it so easily end with his death. No wonder Hirata-dono didn't trust me with the information about the people he shielded. I have tried so hard to eradicate all the poison created by my Uncle's downfall, but I have barely scratched the surface of twisted Urahara greed. Am I really so helpless a leader, that all this can go on behind my back?

"Taichou?"

A tentative knock at the door drew the Captain back to the present, and he raised his voice to call the visitor in. The divide slid back to reveal the Sixth Seat, Kamitani Jun, still bandaged but much recovered from his prior encounter with Aki, and Nagesu pushed the documents aside, casting his subordinate a harried, weary smile.

"Kamitani. What news?"

"Fukutaichou and Yunosuke-dono have returned from the Real World, sir, via the Gate at Twelfth, and sent a man on ahead to report that they managed to retrieve all three corpses successfully. Also, Fourth Division have finished examining the exile's body. They sent a messenger asking what your plans are for the corpse now. Apparently you requested Keitarou's body be brought to Third when all investigation was at an end?"

“Ah, I see. Thank you,” Nagesu got to his feet, adjusting his spectacles. “I did indeed, and I will come directly and give the relevant instructions.”

“Sir...” Kamitani paused, then, “may I ask, why is he being brought back here? With all respect, sir, he betrayed us more than he betrayed anyone.”

“He did,” Nagesu rubbed his brow wearily. “He did, but he was also one of us, and in the first instance, I think the fault was ours. I haven’t forgiven Keitarou for all the things done to us or to Seireitei, but I want to lay this business to rest. Keitarou has a surviving son who has proven himself sympathetic to Seireitei. I think the first step in healing that breach is to give his father a proper Urahara burial, even if he isn’t deserving of that respect. He was still a kinsman and he lost his way. I feel it should be done like this — his body should be returned to my uncle’s former land-holdings and buried there, with his ancestors. Unfortunately, Uncle is not there... but it seems the right thing to do, regardless. I will not perpetuate the hate my Father insisted on. I am tired of it, and so we will make the first move. Ojisama would want it that way — and perhaps, at last, his ghost can also be at rest.”

“I suppose that’s true, sir,” Kamitani looked abashed. “I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to question. Everyone is talking about Keitarou’s son, though, sir... and I suppose that makes sense.”

“I hope so, but time will tell what kind of a man Kohaku turns out to be,” Nagesu offered a weak smile. “I trust more and more each day that I am unlike my father, so perhaps Kohaku will prove to be the same. We shall see. I am sick of fighting my family, so I hope and pray it will be so.”

“There’s one more thing, sir,” Kamitani admitted. “A young man is here to see you. He won’t give his name, sir, but he says he’s come from Endou-taichou. He’s dressed in Seventh Division shihakushou, but I know you’re busy, so I had him wait outside. I don’t know who he is, but he said that you would understand the missive, if you spoke to him direct.”

“From Hirata-dono?” Nagesu faltered, looking momentarily thrown, then he pressed his lips together, contemplating. “Very well. Can you send him in to speak to me, then, please? I will see him. Advise Yunosuke and Shiketsu that I will be a little delayed, but will join them shortly — and then go to Fourth and tell them that nothing is to be done about moving or preparing Keitarou’s corpse until I have been there and given direct instructions on the correct procedures. I will be there within the hour — I do not anticipate this meeting will detain me long, and I have other things to attend to this afternoon.”

“Yes, sir,” Kamitani saluted, wincing slightly as he jarred his injuries, then disappeared, and Nagesu began to tidy together the mess on his desk, his mind racing as he contemplated the cryptic message.

He did not have long to wait, however, for the door slid open once more to reveal a young man of about the age of Hirata’s dead son, robed in neat black and white. He was slender and tall, lean and rangy rather than heavily built, but it was the shock of silvery hair pulled back in a casual tail with black ribbon, and the argentine eyes that told Nagesu that his visitor was not simply a member of Seventh coming to bring a message. He let out an exclamation of disbelief, and at his reaction, the stranger bowed his head sombrely in greeting.

“Please, forgive my intrusion,” he said softly, “and, also, my deception in coming here. I am not a member of the Seventh, though it is true that I come from Hirata-sama and with his knowledge.”

“Your hair...” Nagesu faltered, struggling to get a grip on his composure, and the young man raised his gaze, inclining his head slightly to confirm the Captain’s unspoken suspicions.

“I am Ichimaru Joumei,” he said simply. “I am the current head of the exiles once known as Keitsune no Uragimono, and the grandson of Ichimaru Kokumei, the man your Lord Father and his court shunned more than a hundred years ago.”

“Ichimaru...” Nagesu sank down behind his desk hurriedly, gazing at the stranger as though seeing a ghost. “Then it is you, or your kind, who have been working in the shadows, providing scientific information to my comrades and aiding and abetting in the destruction of my cousin, Keitarou?”

“Yes, sir,” Joumei acknowledged gravely. “I realise the presumptiveness of such actions, and, also, the insolence you probably see in my presence here now. I know how hated my people are in District Three, and have lived with that knowledge my whole life. However, Souja-dono was my friend, and I could not protect him. If it cost my life, I was willing to do whatever necessary to repay that debt.”

He smiled faintly.

“Hirata-sama did not approve my coming here,” he admitted. “He knows I am here, but he counselled me against diving in like this. He thought it might be dangerous, but my life is no longer something to be treated as precious and wrapped in cotton wool. My people are dead or dispersed, and only my sister and I remain. If you wish to seize me, as Head of the Kitsune, and satisfy an ancient grievance by taking my life, so be it. All I ask in return is that you allow my sister to live her life in peace and safety, in whatever way she sees fit.”

Nagesu gazed at the newcomer for a moment, then he sighed, burying his head in his hands.

“My family are far from perfect,” he said wearily, “and I am not my father, Joumei-dono. I have spent most of my life trying to repair the damage his paranoia and severity created, yet whenever I close one hole, another crack opens up. I did not know that any of your family had survived, or I am sure I would have addressed this issue before. I know, of course, the events that culminated in your grandfather being exiled from the family, but I was powerless then. Well, who knows, perhaps I am as powerless now.”

He lowered his hands, meeting Joumei’s gaze thoughtfully.

“This sister...” he added, “Ukitake and Hirata-dono both mentioned that the scientific paperwork had come from a girl. That would be your sister?”

“Yes, sir. Her name is Izumi.”

“But you did not bring her with you today?”

“No, sir,” Joumei shook her head. “I mean no disrespect, but I did not seek to risk her life if I was risking my own by coming to speak to you directly.”

“You’re not risking anything by standing here and telling me the truth,” Nagesu reflected. “I have no grievance against you or your kin. The decisions made in the past were made by people now long dead, on both your side and mine. I want to repair this family, not spend my time persecuting branches of it. Keitarou’s death has just made me more determined in that regard... and if I am willing to forgive Keitarou’s son his genetic connections, I can’t possibly overlook justice for yours.”

Joumei’s features relaxed slightly at this, and he looked relieved.

“Juushirou-dono said you were a fair man, and would listen,” he admitted, causing Nagesu to redden in embarrassment at this blunt observation. “For that reason, I gambled my coming here. I would not have, only... I think Izumi has become attached to Inner Seireitei, and I... do not want to leave her here without knowing that she will be safe.”

“You don’t plan on remaining here yourself?” Nagesu was startled. “You’re dressed as a shinigami, and Hirata-dono gave me the impression...”

“I’m not a shinigami, not a real one, and whilst I work for Hirata-sama, I don’t usually do so here,” Joumei shook his head. “I took this role temporarily to compensate for the incapacitation of a good officer who happily now seems to be recovering his health, but it is not my long-term plan to remain in Inner Seireitei. Keitarou killed members of my family and Izumi and I came here for protection, but now that danger is gone and, if you are no longer interested in hunting us, I feel I can leave and do my duty with a little more freedom. Izumi, though... she hasn’t said it directly, but I am certain she will want to remain here.”

“Very well,” Nagesu pursed his lips, contemplating. “I will permit that, but on one condition. I wish to meet your sister. Her science is extremely impressive and I should like to discuss with her one or two of her methods and conclusions.”

“That might be difficult,” Joumei admitted, and Nagesu arched an eyebrow.

“May I ask why?”

“Izumi doesn’t speak, sir,” Joumei explained earnestly. “I’m the only person left, now, who understands her sign language fluently. I’m scientific, but not in the same league as she is... I wonder if I will be able to translate effectively enough.”

“I see,” Nagesu’s face cleared, and he offered a smile. “Regardless, my thoughts are unchanged. Science is a language in its own right, Joumei-dono. I have seen Izumi-dono’s work, and I have understood her line of thought through her writings, even though we’ve never met. I am eager to make her acquaintance. A talent such as hers should be nurtured, not buried, and if it is in my power, I should like to encourage her to use that ability. Her methods are old-fashioned, and I’m sure, with more recent materials, she’d be able to make even more pertinent observations. Her work probably saved lives this time — maybe, in future, it could save more.”

“Then I will ask her if she will come with me, and I will call on you again, when you are less busy,” Joumei suggested. “I merely wanted to confirm her safety with you, today... and, perhaps, my own, should I choose to visit her in the future.”

“If Izumi-dono is staying at Seventh, when I go speak to Hirata-dono, I shall surely see her then,” Nagesu pointed out, and Joumei shook his head.

“My sister is not at Seventh. She is a recruit at Thirteenth Division,” he said honestly, and Nagesu’s eyes widened at this tid-bit of information.

“Ukitake,” he murmured. “So that’s how he had the data at his disposal... the girl was working under his auspices all the time.”

“Juushirou-dono has been very good to my sister and I,” Joumei agreed. “Thirteenth’s members have accepted Izumi and I would sooner she was there than hiding in places that threaten her health. Up till now nothing has been ideal for her, and she has had little opportunity to mix with anyone other than myself and a close ally and friend who, I’m afraid, fell victim to Keitarou’s assault on our home. I have been surprised and encouraged by the bonds she has begun to build with her new peers, and I would like her to live in the sun and the fresh air from now on, if it is at all possible. You said her methods were old-fashioned, and indeed they are, but she is still very young in many ways. If she were here, I could cease to worry about protecting her, and I would know she was learning to protect herself. Juushirou-dono has made it clear that she is welcome to remain with his squad and that he would very much like to keep her, so if you have no objections, I feel I can leave her there in confidence when I return to my other duties outside of Inner Seireitei.”

“You have my word,” Nagesu said solemnly, holding out his hand, and Joumei took it, shaking it firmly. “If you can trust an Urahara’s word — and I wish I could say that I was certain of its integrity. I assure you, though, that I mean what I say, whatever prior generations might have done. I want peace for my family, and I want it for all parts of the Clan. Whether they are still in Third District or not — it’s time the killing stopped.”

“We are of a similar mind,” Joumei admitted. “Ukitake-dono was right. You are exactly as I hoped you’d be, Nagesu-sama... and, if I may be so impertinent, I believe that a man with that outlook is the leader the Urahara family has needed for a very long time. If anyone can mend the rifts, I am sure it is you.”

“I wish I had that confidence, but I appreciate hearing it,” Nagesu owned. ‘Joumei-dono, before you go,’ as the Kitsune began to make his obeisance before leaving, “I wonder, do you know anything about a branch of the family called Kusakawa?”

“Should I?” Joumei looked surprised, and Nagesu shrugged.

“I have recently discovered untoward activities on their behalf, and I wondered if, in your time working for Hirata-dono, you had ever heard of them,” he admitted, and Joumei shook his head.

“I’m afraid I keep a wide berth where legitimate Urahara are concerned, if possible,” he confessed. “It’s not a family I know... I have never met anyone by that name.”

“Well, they died out twenty five years ago, but there’s no statute of limitations on the effects of treasonous science,” Nagesu said heavily. “It doesn’t matter. If you can’t help, then I won’t trouble you any more.”

“I wasn’t born, then,” Joumei reflected, “but I must go back to my family’s shelter, to properly pay my respects to those Keitarou killed, and bury them in the proper way. When I do, providing Keitarou didn’t unearth them when he was there, I’ll look through my Grandfather and Father’s records. Maybe I will find something.”

“I had no idea you were so young,” Nagesu remarked. “You look young, but... your manner is one much older, even than my own son.”

“Our sins have led us to a lifestyle where we grow up quickly, and die young,” Joumei reflected.

“Then Izumi-dono must indeed be very young.”

“Barely an adult in years,” Joumei admitted. “I hope, though, that leaving the hideout now might at least give Izumi a proper chance at a long life, whatever it does to me. We spent a long time living around Sekkiseki and it’s generally thought that the reason Izumi’s vocal chords didn’t develop properly relates to the conditions of her birth. I don’t know if it has had any other long term effects on her physical health, but I pray she’s left the mine soon enough that she might move beyond it.”

“Your family did not reject her, because she had an imperfection that was unexpected,” Nagesu murmured, and Joumei looked surprised.

“Why would we have done?”

“Ah, yes, why indeed,” Nagesu sighed, shaking his head. “I’m sorry. I discovered that one of my former ministers had done that exact thing with a son of his because the boy was born with some kind of impairment. The child was sold into a terrible situation that resulted in unspeakable things being done to his soul. He was a man from the heart of the Clan — it struck me that perhaps exile is good for the Urahara, if it makes them realise the value of the people they have around them.”

“I see,” Joumei looked solemn. “Izumi is the dearest thing in the world to me and I’ve never seen her lack of speech as an impairment. Nobody among the Kitsune did, we just learned to understand her sign language and it became part of normal life. As I said, though, I’m the only living individual who is fluent in those signs... so maybe, now she’s here, Izumi will have to begin over again in making herself understood.”

“I’m sure that, if she’s with Ukitake’s Division, that won’t take long,” Nagesu observed, and Joumei nodded.

“I cannot repay Juushirou-dono his kindness to us,” he acknowledged. “There is a lot to be said for Seireitei’s shinigami — a lot of good things, and a lot of good people in shihakushou. The longer I’ve been here the more I’ve realised it. Even if Clans make mistakes, or shinigami do, overall, what happens here is important for the stability of everywhere else in Soul Society. If Izumi can be a part of that, then so much to the good. She’s not a child any more, and besides, she’s begun to move on already. She’s ready to embrace the challenge of being here, and lonely as it is for me, I am willing to let her go.”

He smiled sadly.

“Father would’ve been happy to see us make peace with the Mother Clan,” he added. “He always hoped for such a day, which is why he was so willing to forge alliances with people like the Endou and take risks. He was a far wiser leader than I am, and I wish he could’ve lived to see this himself, but at least I feel something has been accomplished. Although most Kitsune have scattered and begun lives of their own, they need no longer look over their shoulders if the Urahara are no longer pursuing them.”

“I haven’t actively pursued anyone except Keitarou for a long time,” Nagesu promised. “He was an exception, and it grieved me to do it. Hunting family is not in my nature. I do not have my father’s ruthlessness, which sometimes is a weakness.”

“Or a strength,” Joumei ruminated. “But I am overstaying my welcome and overstepping the boundaries of rank with my impertinence. My sincere apologies, Nagesu-sama — thank you for finding the time to meet with me.”

“I trust it will be the first of many conversations,” Nagesu remarked. "It would be difficult, if not impossible, to reinstate the Ichimaru family at their previous degree of rank, and I am glad you have not asked me to attempt it. Land has changed hands and the politics of returning to an ancient age would likely create further ructions in my already fragmented court. I can, however, clear your names and pardon your ancestor his crimes, such as they may or may not have been. I was fond of my uncle, and have always believed there are two sides to each story. Go in peace, Ichimaru Joumei, and convey my respects to your sister. I will indeed make time to meet her — but I must make preparations to leave myself. I have messages to receive and a corpse to inspect, among other unsavoury duties... and this afternoon I must meet Keitarou's son, and hope I see the same sincerity in his eyes as I believe I see in yours."

"You are meeting with Kohaku-dono?" Joumei paused, clearly taken aback, and Nagesu's eyes narrowed thoughtfully.

"Ah, so you don't know the Kusakawa family, but you do know Kohaku?" he asked, and Joumei nodded his head.

"He saved my life," he explained grimly. "I have his sister's blood on my hands, Nagesu-sama — I was the agent of Hirata-sama who tracked down and slew the killer of my friend, Souja-dono. Keitarou put his hex on me... but even though he knew I killed his sister, Kohaku-dono chose to free me. I had come back to Seireitei intending to expose his true identity... but in that moment, I knew he was not my enemy. I truly believe the chimera that those of us here in Seireitei witnessed was done for the sake of releasing others under Chudokuga's curse, and more, that the strategy worked. I had understood the boy was in poor health, though... was I wrong?"

"According to a message from Ukitake last night, he has declared himself well enough to stand before the Council, and so today, he will," Nagesu answered. "Your words reassure me that our decision not to kill him is sound. I want to believe Keitarou's son can step away from his father's path of destruction — but with the difficulties I have leaving my own father's shadow, I can't help but have doubts. As Father killed Uncle, so I have plotted to kill Keitarou, a man who was once like a younger brother to me... and so it goes on."

"But you have forgiven my people, and you intend to meet Kohaku-dono, not simply judge him in absentia," Joumei observed. "I believe Kohaku is different from Keitarou. In the moments he freed me, I felt his will to help. We've all made hard decisions during this battle, but ultimately, they were all made for the greater good. Keitarou is dead and now, at last, the world can move on."

“You know, you don’t have to do this today.”

Juushirou pushed open the door of the small sick room, casting its sole occupant a pensive glance. “It’s soon and you’re still recovering — though I have to admit, you certainly look a lot fitter than I expected you to be.”

“I’m all right, at least enough to go and talk to people,” Kohaku turned from where he had been examining his reflection in the mirror, offering his companion a rueful smile. “Kirio-san said that I couldn’t go looking like a vagabond, even if it would get me the sympathy vote... do you think I look all right? I’ve never been summoned before Clan Leaders before... and I’m not sure what I should expect. Especially considering the damage I did to Third Division’s Senkaimon.”

“Yes, well, in the circumstances, I think that will be overlooked,” Juushirou grinned despite himself, crossing the tatami mat floor to stand at the young man’s side. He met Kohaku’s reflected gaze in the mirror, giving an approving nod at what he saw. “And you look fine. Neat and presentable and not about to faint, thank goodness. Though where did the clothing come from? You can’t wear shihakushou before the Council when you’re not a registered shinigami, not considering the circumstances, but I hadn’t realised...”

“Ketsui-dono let me borrow them,” Kohaku admitted, fingering the sleeve of the simple beige hakamashita with a shrug. “I don’t have my own clothes, they were ruined even before I got here, and Kirio-san said I couldn’t go prancing around Seireitei in my nightclothes again, not if I didn’t want the Council to think I was crazy, so she asked Ketsui-dono for help and he found me these. I’m thinner than he is, but they fit all right and I promised him I wouldn’t ruin them.”

“Since you’re not going to blow up anything today, I should hope you can keep that promise,” Juushirou looked amused. ‘I see. I hadn’t realised it was a group conspiracy. I know Kirio told Mitsuki that she was going to do something about your hair, which she has... but I didn’t know it was a Thirteenth Division collective effort. I’m glad, though,’ he added thoughtfully. “I want you to feel that this place is somewhere you can belong, Koku. We haven’t spoken about it, not specifically, but since you raised Kyouka Raigen, it makes your future a little bit more complicated. If you’re here, with shinigami, it should be all right, but I don’t imagine the Council, given your levels of spirit power, would want you running riot around Seireitei under your own auspices. I don’t want you to think you’re a prisoner — I assure you, nothing is further from my mind — but at the same time, if you wanted to leave here... it might be difficult to arrange.”

“It’s all right,” Kohaku fingered the ends of his tail of dark brown hair absently. “I don’t want to go run riot anywhere. I want to stay here. No... I need to. I need to stay here, so if that’s what you think too, I will.”

“As simple as that, huh?” Juushirou looked surprised, and Kohaku smiled sadly.

“My family are gone, but Kirio-san believes I can find a new one, here,” he said matter-of-factly. “She’s bossy and intrusive and overprotective but I like that she is, it makes me feel less alone, and more like what she said is true. Thirteenth has a nice atmosphere and I feel like I’m on the outside of it, but I don’t want to stay there. I admit, I don’t know how to take care of myself, and I’d be frightened of trying... but it’s not just because its easier that I want to stay.”

He released the lock of hair, allowing it to fall back against his shoulders.

“Kirio-san cut my hair and brushed it so hard my head is still tingling,” he admitted. “I’ve never seen myself quite like this, but though I don’t dislike it, I know it’s not right. It’s not really ‘Kohaku’. I’m starting to understand that more and more.”

“How do you mean?” Juushirou looked quizzical, and Kohaku frowned, trying to find the right words.

“It’s there, at the tip of my senses,” he mused. “I can’t quite see it, but it’s there all the same. Kyouka and I were meant to come here — we always were, going back to the time I was born. Maybe Kyouka even chose my soul because that was what was meant to happen. I’m supposed to die in Seireitei, but I was wrong when I thought that meant dying to stop my father killing everyone. I loved him and it hurts that he’s dead. I don’t want that to stop being true, because I betrayed him and I shouldn’t forgive myself too easily. Sacrificing people you love shouldn’t ever be taken lightly, right?”

“I agree,” Juushirou said gravely, “but I also admire the courage you found to make that decision.”

“It was made for me, a long time ago, because Father couldn’t let go,” Kohaku said simply, reaching out a hand towards his reflection and touching the tips to the mirror image’s. “Ukitake-dono, Kyouka’s true form is a mirror. A mirror deep within a castle, and in that mirror he reflects my soul. The first time, when I saw it, my soul was bloody and chained, because it was trapped by Father’s protection and will.

He and I were both wrong about our relationship. I wasn't born to be his secret weapon, but to be his nemesis. I was born because this world needs balance, and father threatened that balance. It's a hard thing for a son to accept, but I can't change it, so I'm going to try and accept it."

"If you're right, it's a heavy burden to bear," Juushirou's gaze softened. "I was very close to my father too. He died protecting me, and so I understand the sense of loss, and the sense of guilt."

"But because of it, you are who you are now, aren't you?" Kohaku turned earnest brown eyes on his companion. "If it hadn't happened that way, would you have done all the things you've done?"

"I imagine not," Juushirou acknowledged. "Every little event shapes the bigger ones, and every big one turns you onto a different path — that's what you're saying, isn't it?"

"Yes," Kohaku agreed. 'I want to make Father's death the same in my life. I want it to move me forward and make me do things that matter. Kyouka Raigen wants that from me, too. He's fed up of me sitting back and letting the world swim by when I have the power to get involved and help. And to do that,' he gestured around him, "it helps to be in a place where people make a difference every day. If I'm alive still, it's for a reason. That's why I want to see your Council today, even if I know that I'm still a little shaky and not fully fit. I have at least been eating since Kirio-san came to talk to me, so I trust I can manage this without passing out again. Either way, I don't want to wait to do this. I want to get their permission to stay here, and take the shihakushou, and work like you have to try and change the inequalities in this world. My parents may both have been born Clan, but the truth is that I'm from Rukongai, and that could change everything."

"Just like I was from the Districts," Juushirou murmured, then he laughed. "I see. Yes, your thought process makes sense. Not everything Keitarou believed in was bad, and there are things we can learn from from the mistakes surrounding his life and his actions, including those made by shinigami. You're right, something must be done about Rukongai — and having you here would certainly be a step towards it. It's a hard path, though, Koku-kun. You'll face a lot of people who'll challenge your right to do or decide anything. The world is changing and has already changed, but real change happens slowly. You won't save it in one day — maybe not even in one lifetime."

"I know," Kohaku nodded. "But I hoped that, if I told you how I felt, you'd agree to support my staying here. Even if the rest of Seireitei isn't ready for a shinigami born in Rukongai, I felt like Thirteenth Division might be different, and so more than anything it matters to me to stay here. Not just in Inner Seireitei, but here, specifically, with you and Kirio-san and everyone else."

He shrugged, embarrassed.

"I'll probably be an awful shinigami, and I have no training or education to speak of," he admitted. "I don't like killing things, and I've never really learned to hold a sword. Even so, though, it matters to me to do this. I came here to do this. I'm sure that my brother knew it, and maybe he saw it in my memories of past visions before even I did. There are a lot of things I saw when I was very small which are muddled and mixed together, and my recollections of them are patchy, but Father often put bits of them together to form his own ideas and I think Katsu-nii must have done the same thing. That's why he asked Edogawa-san to make sure I was all right, and why he cut off communication between us. The more I look at my reflection here, the more I feel like the real Kohaku ought to be wearing a shihakushou, and that nothing can begin until he does."

"As far as I'm concerned, you're an honorary extension of this squad already," Juushirou reflected. 'Providing the Council don't object, you can be assured of my support. People already think I've adopted you,' he added sheepishly, "so I suppose it wouldn't be too much of a step further to make you my recruit. I have a reputation for being unconventional when it comes to recruitment decisions... and it usually pays off."

"I'm grateful to you for everything you've done for me," Kohaku said seriously. "You've been kinder to me than anyone, so I hoped you'd understand the way I felt. Everything in my life is different, now, and I know next to nothing about Seireitei, let alone how to live or work here, so I will need help to do that, properly. I know you're the only Captain and the only squad not based around one of the Clans, so I was sure that you of all people would know how it feels to be outside of your comfort zone."

"Sometimes that can work to your advantage," Juushirou rubbed his chin pensively, "but I grant you, there are times — and especially, when I was a student, many times when my ignorance of Clan intrigue put me in harm's way."

"It's because it's another world completely, not just another piece of Soul Society," Kohaku said earnestly. "There are birds and flowers in the books Kirio-san brought me that I've never even seen. Foods I've never tasted. Customs I've never encountered and people I've never met. I'd never seen the sun or the moon till I came here, and to begin with, the light dazzled me. That kind of ignorance frightens me the more I think about it. Seeing the future or the past is worthless if you don't understand the present properly... and it's fine to want to preserve life, but how can you if you've never lived it?"

He shrugged again.

"In Rukongai, shinigami were just names and shadows in my thoughts and dreams, but now they're real people with hopes and wishes of their own," he concluded. "Sometimes they're good, sometimes not. Some make mistakes, others don't. That's kind of why I wanted to get up and see the Council as soon as I felt well enough, to be honest. I want to try and save Tenichi-dono from a charge of treason, if I possibly can, and taking action is actually preferable right now to lying in bed thinking about what I've lost."

"Kirio said you'd mentioned wanting to help him," Juushirou's eyes became serious. "I don't know what Tenichi's fate will be, but I do know he's deeply distressed by all that's happened. He was a recruit of mine, once, but when I spoke to him, he was like a stranger and it was upsetting to see. I don't know if there's anything you can really do for him, Koku, but I'm grateful and glad you want to try."

"Ketsui-dono said that, too," Kohaku remembered. "He said that the last time he saw Tenichi-dono, they were like strangers, but he felt sure that, with my testimony, his brother would at least be spared his life. I think Ketsui-dono and I have a lot in common, right now, but I can't do anything to protect Katsu-nii. The things he's done are much worse than what Tenichi-dono is imprisoned for. Even if Katsu-nii was arrested, and I did everything I could and sacrificed everything I had, I don't think I have the power to save him. I might be able to help Ketsui-dono's brother, though. I do know what happened to him in Rukongai, and I can testify about it. I know Tenichi-dono wasn't Father's agent. He called himself my ally, but he was never really Father's, even if they were kin and Father made him confused."

He smiled.

"If I'm really his ally, it's my duty to stick by him now and try to help," he decided. "And if I want the people in Thirteenth to let me be one of them, I should begin by proving I'm not like my father and I want to help. It might not do any good, but at least I can say I've tried."

"Then I won't try to stop you," Juushirou assured him. "Right now, though, we should leave. I'm coming with you — I think it's best I do — but the Council don't like latecomers and I'd rather keep them in a good mood from the start."

"Kirio-san said there's a rumour that you stormed them and threatened them with mutiny the last time you spoke to them," Kohaku eyed Juushirou curiously, noticing the red tint that touched the older man's cheeks and the sheepish smile that spread across his thin, pale features.

"I wouldn't go that far," he said cautiously, "but I may have overstepped the usual courtesy mark in getting my opinions across."

"Was that really on my behalf?" Kohaku's eyes became wide, and Juushirou shot him a crooked grin.

"You'll find soon enough that when I believe in something, I believe in it wholesale," he said frankly. "I told you before, I believe in you. You have to give trust to get it, and I've not seen anything that's suggested to me my judgement was wrong. On the contrary, a lot of people are alive now who might not have been if you hadn't acted."

"There were people I couldn't save," Kohaku's features became sombre. "Not only Father, but others, too. It feels as though I somehow killed them. When you know the consequences of your actions, it makes it harder to act, so I probably won't forget those people for a while yet. I knew, too, that if I destroyed the Senkaimon, the injured shinigami in the Real World would be at increased risk of dying. I was willing to take that risk — but it's that kind of judgement that I need help with. I don't want to be choosing who lives and who dies, even if I have the power to determine it."

"All the injured from the Real World are alive, and those who didn't make it back were killed quickly — getting them to the Gate would have made no difference at all," Juushirou assured him. "As for Anabomi and the Ninth, it's a terrible tragedy, but one that you couldn't have prevented."

"If I'd reached the Gate sooner, maybe I'd have been able to free Anabomi-dono from Father's spell in time."

"And maybe you could spend a life time thinking about past what-if scenarios, but that won't get the future saved," Juushirou reminded him gently. "Come on. It's not far to the Council Chambers, and though the whole atmosphere is imposing, I'm on your side. I won't let any of them hurt you — you have my word."

"I know," Kohaku admitted. "I know you'd never betray me. I lied when we met, the first time. I knew who you were... I'd always known your name, but till I met you, I didn't understand why Father was so bothered by you. Maybe that's why I let my guard down and told you I was from Rukongai. I didn't want to trust Seireitei, but I knew when I first met you that I could trust in your word, Juushirou-dono. I think that's why Father wanted you to die. He thought you would be an obstacle to him and a threat to my using my powers the way he wanted. I wonder if he realised that it would be your kindness, not your sword, that would make that true."

"You called me Juushirou-dono," Juushirou blinked, and Kohaku reddened, looking stricken.

"I'm sorry! It just slipped..."

"It's all right," Juushirou assured him. "I don't mind. It just surprised me. You've preserved the formality between us till now so carefully."

"I know," Kohaku gazed at his feet, his cheeks still burning. "I am sorry. It came out without my even thinking about it. I don't know why. Maybe because Kyouraku-dono calls you Juushirou... I don't know. Perhaps because Father did. Maybe it's buzzing around in my thoughts, the need to make sure "Juushirou" doesn't die. I didn't mean to be rude."

"You weren't, and I really don't mind," Juushirou patted the young man on the shoulder. "If you stay here, you'll notice that there are times when other people drop their rank formality and refer to me in more familiar terms than you just have. My Vice Captain, my Third Seat and I were classmates at the Academy, and sometimes, those bonds are stronger than the ones of office. I like close bonds within my squad, so I don't mind. But, if you do recruit, at times when you're on duty, you will have to call me Captain. For a recruit to do anything else would be seen as impertinent — even if I didn't consider it to be."

"I promise," Kohaku recovered himself, offering an embarrassed smile. "I'll remember. Thank you for understanding."

"People have said before that I use kindness as a weapon," as the two men crossed the courtyard, ducking beneath the Division gate, Juushirou's expression became thoughtful. "If they're right, then I don't think I do it on purpose. But if being kind to people is useful, then I suppose it's not a bad trait to have. It doesn't mean I'm trying to replace your father's position in your life, nor will I ever. Just, as I'm sure Kirio has told you, Thirteenth Division is a family. A unique, hotch-potch family of folk from all over Seireitei, and all different walks of life — but that's partly why it works."

He shot his companion a sidelong grin.

"I will be using up my entire quota of eccentricity, if I manage to secure your recruitment," he added. "I already took on one recruit outside of the normal channels, and, given her contributions in this affair, I very much hope to keep her, if it can be arranged."

"The silver fox?" Kohaku asked quizzically, and Juushirou looked amused.

"She has a name, you know. Just like you do."

"I know," Kohaku coloured again, "but I find it hard to see her in my mind as anything other than a silver fox. Her and her brother, both. I've met her brother, but I can't remember meeting her. All I have is that vague impression of the silver vixen that Tenichi-dono tried to kill."

"And, thankfully, he didn't succeed," Juushirou sighed heavily. "Her name is Izumi, Koku, and if I do manage to keep her, you will see a good deal of her. You will be recruits together, and with the four I already have, that will make six in total. Well, Thirteenth is already the smallest squad. It's not as though we don't have the requisite capacity to take on more, and I'd like to expand our numbers if I possibly can."

"You don't think that Izumi-dono might not like it, being close to the son of someone who hurt her family?" Kohaku was anxious, and Juushirou shook his head.

"Izumi knows, because Joumei told her, that you saved him from Keitarou's spell," he said frankly. "He is alive because of what you did, then, and now that your identity is no longer a secret, he felt safe in telling her. She also understands what it is to be treated badly because of sins committed by other kin. Like you, she's not familiar with the ways of a shinigami, but like you, I believe she has a purpose here in Seireitei and that she ought to fulfil it, if it's what she wants. Besides, I think she's become part of our 'family' of late."

His eyes twinkled, but he did not elaborate on what he meant, and Kohaku sighed, turning to gaze around him at the surrounding barracks.

The streets were still quiet, and though the odd officer stood on duty outside of certain buildings, they simply saluted Juushirou, a gesture he acknowledged with a nod of his head.

“A Captain can really walk through here without anyone blinking, can’t he?” Kohaku murmured, and Juushirou looked rueful.

“No, a Captain is answerable to the same things as anyone else,” he said thoughtfully. “If I was to overstep my position in a dangerous way, I could be arrested and tried. Probably, a Captain would not be allowed a light sentence if they did something untoward. We have a certain level of responsibility and duty to the officers in our command, and those around Seireitei, so a rogue Captain is too dangerous to be treated leniently. The more power you hold, the greater the burden you carry. At the same time, though, it gives you the opportunity to do more good. It’s a delicate balance — well, much like this world itself.”

“Being a shinigami is much more complicated than I ever realised, growing up,” Kohaku absorbed this with a thoughtful look on his face.

“We do make mistakes,” Juushirou agreed. “We’re not perfect, and sometimes, things happen that we can’t control. All we can do then is try and fix the damage as best as we can. Whether we’re worthy of our rank or not depends on whether we’re able to face that, rather than try to cover it with pride and ego. And, speaking of pride, this is where we’re going. The Council Chambers.”

He paused, gesturing the building that stood before them, and Koku let out a gasp, fear claspings its cold hand around his heart as he gazed up at the intimidating structure.

“I have to go... in there?” he whispered, and Juushirou nodded.

“Clan tradition demands pomp and circumstance,” he said dryly, “but they aren’t summoning you as a traitor to Soul Society. If that were the case, the Onmitsukidou would’ve called for you... and even if I called in favours from my friends there, I doubt I could prevent your arrest if the Council seriously wanted it. They don’t, thankfully — but they are curious to meet you. They have questions, and so do you. I will be with you, so don’t worry.”

“I suppose I asked for it,” Kohaku swallowed the bile that rose in his throat. “I asked to come here. I need to see it through now, else Kyouka will give me more hell for running away.”

“This was Kyouka’s idea?” Juushirou asked, but Kohaku shook his head.

“Mine, but Kyouka expects me to be proactive from now on, if possible,” he said ruefully. “I need to learn a lot more about my sword, but one thing I do know is that he’s nicer to me if he feels like I'm doing everything I can. I'll sleep far better tonight if I do this now, so I'll do it. Kyouka in a bad mood is more frightening a prospect than the Council of Elders, even if they are all important people."

"Yes, we need to talk properly about your sword," Juushirou agreed, pushing open the main doors of the Council hall and leading his apprehensive charge inside and guiding him down the long, high-ceilinged hallway towards another, equally impressive door. Though there were points for guards to be stationed, there was nobody outside this time, and on reaching this point, the Thirteenth Division Captain paused.

"I'll write to my former Sensei at the Academy and we'll take his advice," he reflected. "He's lived a long time and knows a lot about zanpakutou. Though I looked in the archive here, I didn't find anything that related specifically to the things you'd told me. That was before you finalised your summoning, too — and now is a key time in your relationship with Kyouka Raigen. We can't send you to the Academy, not with the level of power you have and the stage you are in your sword summoning — but regardless, I think Sensei's input will be valuable and he ought to be consulted."

"Maybe your Sensei will know about Kyouka's lives before," Kohaku reflected, and Juushirou looked quizzical.

"Lives before? Kyouka's spirit is reincarnated?"

"He said so. He said he was very old, but that his nature changed each time he was born and bonded to a new soul, so so did the last part of his name," Kohaku agreed. "I'd like to know more about that, because I think it might help me know about him now. I decided I want to work with him, rather than against him — but I want to find out about him from other places than just what he tells me, so I can really understand."

"Then I'll mention that to Sensei, too, and see what he comes up with," Juushirou decided. "I'm glad you mentioned it to me. I've heard of swords being reborn before, but I don't know much about how or why that comes about. Sensei will, though — I've heard the sword he holds is one such weapon."

He grinned, raising his hand and curling it into a fist.

"Right now, though, your audience awaits," he said warmly. "You must bow when first you enter, it's tradition, but when they tell you to stand, hold your head up high. Also, listen carefully to what they ask you. They are eight very different individuals, and they will each treat you quite differently, I imagine — but they have all agreed not to pursue charges against you, so don't let them frighten you. You have done nothing wrong. Remember it."

With that he rapped firmly on the substantial door, and, as Kohaku's heart began to pound in his chest, the heavy divide creaked open, revealing what looked like bleak darkness beyond. Reminded of the first time he had visited Kyouka's dream castle, Kohaku closed his eyes, taking a deep breath to compose himself. Then he turned to Juushirou, meeting his gaze.

"I'm ready," he said softly, nodding his head. Juushirou gave him an encouraging smile, then took him gently by the arm, leading him forward into the heart of the chamber. As they approached the midpoint, the Captain paused, dropping in his regulation bow, and Kohaku faltered, then followed his companion's example, sure that his pulse was loud enough that everyone in the room assembled would be able to hear it.

"Ukitake, you may stand," The voice was soft and gentle, yet Kohaku could hear the weariness that edged it, as though the speaker had undergone significant strain, and it was an effort to resist the urge to raise his gaze to see for himself. Ahead of him, Juushirou had obeyed the command, taking a step or two forward so that his feet were no longer in Kohaku's line of sight, but the older man's reiatsu presence comforted him that he was not alone, and nor would he ever be, not so long as he put his faith in this man. That understanding helped to calm his racing heart, and he focused on taking deep breaths, reminding himself of the reasons he had decided to come.

"You have brought the boy," it was not a question, and this speaker's tones were different, sharp and wary, as though he were not entirely convinced of the Council's decision of leniency.

"Yes sir. I have," Juushirou's own tones were calm and even. "Kohaku would like to address the Council, and has come to present himself before you all as evidence of his good intent towards Soul Society."

"You stand surety for this boy in all respects, Juushirou?" A woman's voice, and then, again, Juushirou's comforting answer.

"As I believe I stated previously, Midori-sama... I will vouch for Kohaku's innocence and will continue to do so."

"Then we should speak to him ourselves," the gentle voice was back. "Your companion may stand, Ukitake, and present himself to us as you say he wishes."

“Koku, its all right. The Council are ready to speak to you,” Juushirou’s tones were a low murmur, and Kohaku realised with a jolt that he had been focusing so much on the tones of voice of these strangers that he had almost missed his cue. He scrambled to his feet, knowing that his pale cheeks were probably flushing with awkward colour once more, but as he rose, he caught Juushirou’s reassuring gaze, and felt better once again. Offering the faintest of smiles, he turned to face the speakers who, he now saw, sat in an incomplete ring around his position. There were nine chairs, one of which was raised above the others as though signifying a position of greater duty, and, as he scanned his gaze around the others, Kohaku made out the Clan crests that adorned each of the other seats. One was empty, and Kohaku’s heart caught for a moment as he recognised the crest of the Urahara carved into the wood. Was the Urahara Clan Leader not present? But no, as he returned his attention to the most prominent of the seats, he realised that, from the man’s fair hair and pale eyes, this must be the Third District incumbent. This was his father’s cousin, Nagesu... the man who had occupied such an ambiguous role in Keitarou’s life.

“You are Aizen Kohaku?” This man spoke now, and Kohaku recognised the gentle voice that had first addressed Juushirou when they had entered. Sure enough, behind the stranger’s spectacles, he could see signs of weariness in the pale eyes, lines of consternation marring his brow. At the sight of these obviously human traits, Kohaku gathered his courage, lowering his head in a respectful bow.

“Yes, sir. I am.”

“You acknowledge that you are the son of Aizen Keitarou, the exile and an outlaw of Seireitei?”

“Yes, sir. He was my father,” Kohaku agreed again, though his own use of past tense made a fresh wave of sadness wash over his slender frame.

“Then you are the boy who brought my son Souja back from Rukongai?” Another man spoke now, and Kohaku turned, his eyes widening in stricken realisation as, for the first time, he laid eyes on his mother’s older brother, the Head of the Endou Clan, Hirata. Though he lacked Eiraki’s vivid sapphire eyes, there was no mistaking the resemblance between her and both this man and the young shinigami Vice Captain whose life he had not been able to save, and before he knew what he was doing, he had bowed low before Hirata’s seat.

“I’m sorry, sir,” he said softly. “I tried to help him, true enough, but I failed. I was weak and I couldn't save him. I'm sorry."

"Raise your head," Hirata instructed, and warily Kohaku did so, startled at the glitter of emotion in the other man's eyes. "I would like to look at you, full in the face, and see this child my sister brought into the world for myself."

"Hirata-sama, this is not a family gathering," the acerbic tones came from the incumbent of the First Division seat, but to Kohaku's surprise, Hirata ignored the other man's words, instead getting to his feet and stepping, carefully, down from the small dais on which the Seventh District seat was positioned.

"Hirata-sama!" The First District representative was clearly put out at this flagrant disregard for normal protocol, but Kohaku saw Hirata exchange glances with Juushirou, who gave a little nod, as if confirming an unspoken question. The Endou Leader's eyes narrowed slightly, then he turned to Kohaku, resting his hands on the other's shoulders before the young man could react, and meeting his gaze head on. A faint whip of reiatsu told Kohaku that a predator slept deep within this man's soul, and it would be as well not to wake it, but there was nothing of the hunter in Hirata's current expression, and though the air around them had become thicker at Hirata's proximity, Kohaku found he was still able to breathe.

"I want to hear it from your own lips," Hirata spoke softly. "I know you brought back my son, and I share your regret that he did not survive. But I want to know... whether your father wished my son ill. I want to know the truth, and whether you tried to warn Souja because of Keitarou's actions, or because of something else."

"My father never ordered Souja-dono to die," Somehow Kohaku found his voice, though his throat was suddenly dry. "My sister murdered your son, Hirata-sama. My spirit power allows me, sometimes, to see glimpses of the future. Because of that, I alone knew that he was in danger before the time he arrived in Rukongai. When he came, I waited, and I tried to warn him, but he left via shunpo, and I cannot perform that skill. By the time I found him, my sister had already hurt him. I'm not a healer. I lack any useful skills, and I didn't even know how to open the Gate. Souja-dono asked my help to get back, and so I tried to do that. I came back with him from Rukongai, but I could not do more for him than that."

"Why would you put your sister and your family at risk on the bare chance that my son might return to Seireitei alive?" Hirata demanded. "Why would you try to warn Souja, when it would've been easier to let it lie?"

“Because I knew, if Souja-dono died, then there would be a war between my Father and your people, sir,” Kohaku wetted his lips, all too aware of the flickering energy at the edges of his companion’s aura. “I knew that if he died, everything would change and other people would die. Maybe lots of people. ..And, one more reason.”

“Which was?”

“I saw someone who was hurt and who wanted to go home,” Kohaku’s voice softened, and Hirata’s eyes widened at his words. “I knew that I would be attacked by the kestrel... I mean the shinigami with the kestrel sword — if I crossed into Seireitei, and I knew that I would never be able to go back. I knew that, but you can’t just walk by someone who needs your help, even if you can’t give it.”

Hirata’s hands slipped away from Kohaku’s body at this, and he let out a heavy sigh.

“I see,” he said at length. “Thank you. I wanted to hear it from you, rather than from Juushirou. You met my gaze when answering and I believe you told me the truth. I believe you truly wanted to save my son. He certainly believed in you — he begged us to protect you, and wouldn’t rest until we promised that we would. I see the reasons for it now, in your eyes. You truly aren’t an Endou — and I’m glad.”

He turned towards Nagesu, bowing his head in apology.

“I’m sorry, Nagesu-sama, for interrupting the Council’s session, but as a father, I had to know,” he said regretfully. “Even if it was unorthodox, since Juushirou hasn’t allowed me contact with the boy till now, I had to take this chance. I might not ever have had another.”

“Hirata, that’s harsh,” Juushirou spoke up himself now, and Kohaku stared at him in amazement, for the Thirteenth Division Captain had addressed this important Clan leader without even a single honorific, scolding him as though they were equals, not leagues apart in birth and standing. “You know the reasons why we kept you apart — and now you’ve had your chance to settle for yourself the kind of person Kohaku is. I promised Souja to protect him, too, and I’ve done so... even if that meant protecting him from you and the Wind Hawk.”

“Touche,” Hirata offered the white haired man a wry smile, clearly not at all affronted by Juushirou’s critical tones, “but you needn’t worry about it from now on. I don’t intend on causing Kohaku any harm, Juushirou. You have my word. He’s not my enemy. Although I can’t speak for my kin, which brings me to something else of imminent importance,”

He glanced at Kohaku again.

“I intend to denounce your parents’ marriage, because it was not authorised by the Clan. It took place after Keitarou abducted your mother and after he was already declared an outlaw by Seireitei,” he added. “I had already thought to do it, before, but because of your presence here, my Clan have now given me no alternative. Because she is my blood sister, and because of the circumstances of her disappearance from District Seven, my advisors will not accept Eiraki betrayed me of her own accord. Even though I know she did, her current mental state, I have been informed, has left her unable to speak her own mind and she is unlikely to be tried for the crimes she committed against the Kuchiki and against Seireitei. Only such a conviction would settle them that this was her will and not a forced matrimony on a gullible young woman — and so they will not disown her. That, unfortunately, puts you in a difficult position for us both. A girl cannot inherit the Clan, but there are ways that her son might. I have lost Souja, and it is unlikely I will ever have any more children — my wife’s health since his death has been far too frail and her grief too complete to contemplate such a thing, even if I was callous enough a man to think Souja could ever be replaced. This troubles the Clan, yet you cannot be seen as an heir in my son’s place, not even under the remotest of possibilities. If Eiraki’s marriage is not made invalid, your life will be in constant danger from militant Endou wanting to clear you from the succession. Your father is hated by people in District Seven, in a deeper and more twisted way than, probably, anywhere else in Seireitei, because of the large number of people whose lives he damaged, both peasantry and nobility alike. We are, by nature, a warrior people, and I can’t guarantee that, if this denouncement is not done, formalised and made public, even my own father might not try and have you killed.”

“What?” Juushirou’s eyes almost fell out of his head at this, and Hirata offered his friend a sad smile.

“After our meeting, I spoke to Kikyue, and she accepted the Council’s terms,” he responded. “I rode home early the next morning, called an emergency meeting, and spoke to Father and my Clan council of advisors. They were unanimous in their judgement. Katsura is already discarded as a felon and would face trial if ever he resurfaced, but Kohaku is not. If he is illegitimate, they aren’t interested in him. An illegitimate child can never inherit the Endou, not even through forced combat, because they are considered outside of Clan degrees and therefore, ineligible. Any attempt they make to challenge the leader results, normally, in them meeting a messy end long before they have their chance to try, and knowing they would never win over the other Clansfolk, few attempt it. If Kohaku is Eiraki's legitimate heir, however, and a blood Endou, then I should kill him — or someone else almost certainly will. Father said explicitly that they didn't want to create more bloodshed, but they couldn't condone a potential figurehead for rebellion against my authority, not now my own heir is dead. It could create ructions and destabilise everything we've worked for in Seventh if that were to happen, and so he felt there wasn't much choice but to tackle the issue head on. Either I publically and formally denounce my sister's marriage to Keitarou, or... Kohaku might find himself in a dangerous position. And, if I protected him — so might I. Not from Father, but from others, waiting in the wings."

"But I don't want to inherit the Endou Clan!" Despite himself, Kohaku could not remain silent at this, his horror and dismay growing with every word spoken. "I'm not even an Endou, not really! Mother said she left your family — and I wasn't even born in Seireitei!"

"As I said, the only way of getting around it is to declare you and your siblings illegitimate," Hirata said simply. "I understand you are literate, so if you are willing to sign papers to that effect, Kohaku, my Clan will disown you and you will never be able to call on them in any regard. If they do that, though, then you won't be threatened by them. I had my kin promise they would not act until I had spoken to you directly and offered you my terms, but I also promised them that I'd make those terms clear the first opportunity I had to meet with you. Here we have sufficient reliable witnesses — and the Endou are not a patient family."

"Hirata..." Juushirou was clearly troubled, but Kohaku shook his head.

"I will sign whatever you need me to sign, Hirata-sama," he said at length. "I don't want your Clan. I don't want to be Clan. I don't care about any of those things, and I never have. I don't want to be an Endou, nor am I really one, deep down inside. My spirit power isn't like your family's. Mother used to tell us stories about Endou of the past, and I think she still held pride in that bloodline, but I'm not like them. If they want to kill me over something so silly, then I want it even less. I don't mind if I'm considered illegitimate by your people. It doesn't matter to me."

"Harsh judgement, Hirata-dono," the brown-haired man to Hirata's side commented, and Hirata nodded.

"It is not my will, but theirs, Tokutarou-sama," he said honestly.

“Now I’ve met Kohaku, I’m satisfied that we will never cross blades over my Clan. I don’t know whether we are kin — we are strangers, yet, but I believe he should be allowed to live his life free of the stigma from his parents and his siblings. I am not personally shunning him, but I am still the Endou Clan leader.. I have to abide by their opinions too, because I — and they — hold the lives of everyone in District Seven in their hands, and the periods of unrest in the past are still in living memory for too many people. If Kohaku will sign the declaration, he will be left to do as he pleases. It is a more... unforgiving judgement than I had hoped for, based on Kikyue’s positive response — but not all of the people at home understand how good a judge of character my son really was, and his loss has struck deep.”

“I will sign,” Kohaku repeated. “I don’t want to cause anyone’s death, and I haven’t given up on living my life and doing things with it to help repair what Father did. I want to stay here, with Ukitake-dono, and be of use to Seireitei in whatever way I can, to repay him for his kindness to me. I don’t need to be part of a Clan to do that. I’m not here right now because I belong to a Clan. I’m from Rukongai. I want... I want you to see me as from Rukongai. I want to do whatever I do from now on with people knowing that because I know Ukitake-dono is from the Districts, and because of the things he did, people started to let District folk have a voice in Seireitei. I know people in Rukongai are suffering because nobody knows they’re there. I... I want to speak for them, because I know they are there. My mother and father helped them and protected them, but now Mother is in custody and Father is dead. Those people still need support, but they’re scared, and so if it’s known that I’m from Rukongai, maybe...”

“Enough,” Nagesu held up his hand, and Kohaku trailed off, his eyes widening as he realised how much of a tangent he had been on. “We are getting ahead of ourselves and my aching head won’t permit us to skip through topics at express speed, not today. It is accepted by the Council that Aizen Kohaku has renounced any claim or link to the Endou Clan, in view of witnesses, and will sign documents to that effect. That matter is resolved, and so is the truth of Souja-dono’s murder, I feel. But there are other questions we have to ask — other things we need to know, before we can discuss the impact of the wishes you just raised, Kohaku.”

Kohaku reddened, lowering his gaze, and Juushirou let out a sigh.

“I had promised Kohaku that this would not be a traumatic event,” he said, somewhat reproachfully, though his words were polite. “He is still recovering from a bad injury, not to mention the shock of exhausting so much spirit power and the loss of a kinsman he loved dearly. He wanted to come here today because he felt it was important you all heard him speak. This isn't simply about the Council making demands of him, but about laying to rest the divides of the past. Hirata's circumstances were things I wasn't aware of, and perhaps it's as well that was resolved now, but with respect, Nagesu-sama, Kohaku is not a suspect in a crime. He is a witness, but you are already all familiar with what happened in Seireitei in your absence. If you wish my charge to confirm the truth of what we said, then I'm sure he will — but I promised Edogawa-san that I would not overtax her patient, and I have no desire to break that promise."

"I agree with Ukitake-taichou," A tall, dark woman interjected at this juncture, and as Kohaku stared at her, he was aware that she was regarding him thoughtfully. "Kohaku-dono is not yet entirely fit, and I can sense the grief still lingering in his aura. He has been brave to come before us like this, and besides, we have discussed already the events that occurred. A repeat seems superfluous."

"Retsu-sama..." the man named Tokutarou began, but the woman, Retsu, held up her hand to stop him.

"We know enough of what happened, and we know the results of those actions," she chided. "We are now here to put back together the broken pieces. Kohaku-dono has made it very clear to all of us what his feelings and intentions are. We are not in a position to demand anything from a young man to whom we are heavily indebted. If anything, this meeting marks a truce — a first tentative peace between Seireitei and the family of Aizen Keitarou. It may be our only chance to do so, and we should not let the opportunity pass lightly."

"A... truce?" The First District representative was clearly once more put out. "Retsu-sama, I realise the Unohana Clan believe in peace and reconciliation, but your officers were also murdered in this incident!"

"But not by Kohaku-dono," Retsu's tones remained pleasant, but Kohaku shivered involuntarily at the sudden hint of ice in her eyes, and despite himself, the other Clansman subsided. "My officers were killed by Aizen Sakaki, who I believe is also dead, and Aizen Katsura, whose whereabouts remain unknown."

"Do you know where your brother is?" Midori cast Kohaku a quizzical look, and Kohaku shook his head.

"I don't," he said honestly. "He left me and he cut off all communication between us so I would not know. He wanted it that way, and I think it's better, too. I love my brother and I wouldn't give him up, even if I did know where he was... because I know you would kill him, and even though I know he's done bad things, they were done because of Father's pressure and influence, not because Katsu-nii really understood all the implications of what was done. My sister, she was a killer. That's all she was, but Katsu-nii isn't the same. His actions were Father's fault, and he has to live with them."

"Seventh Division continue to search for him, but without success," Hirata said heavily. "We believe Keitarou spirited him away when he was injured... how he escaped otherwise isn't clear, but somehow he did. Whatever happened, though, it seems Kohaku was with Thirteenth Division at the time, because it was at this point he released my man from Keitarou's control spell. He wasn't involved in his brother's escape — and its unlikely he could know where Katsura now is."

The Council don't know what Edogawa-san did, in healing Katsu-nii.

Kohaku's eyes widened as he processed this.

Ukitake-dono has kept it from them. They let my brother go... for my sake, or for his?

He cast Juushirou a sidelong glance, but the Thirteenth Division Captain's expression was impassive, and gave nothing away.

"He could use all these magic powers of his to find out," The First Division shinigami suggested.

"That would not be in the spirit of a truce, Yuuichi-sama," Retsu reasoned, "and Kohaku has already expended much energy on our behalf. He is not in a fit state to do so again, nor will we ask him to. Katsura-dono will answer for his own crimes when Seireitei finds him, but we have already agreed not to impress those crimes on innocent men."

"If Retsu-sama can speak thus, then the matter of Katsura is inconsequential and we can tackle it when we have the suspect in custody," the representative from District Six spoke up at length now. "Justice cannot be done by proxy."

"I'm surprised to hear such a thing from you, Guren-sama," Midori admitted, and Guren shrugged.

"I am resigned," he admitted, and Kohaku's expression became one of concern as he realised that this was the man whose son his mother had murdered with poison so many years earlier. "With Eiraki-hime in her current condition, there is no hope of justice for my son, yet I find myself less angry about it than I thought I would. Even if she can never be tried, and even if she remains in custody for her whole life, unconvicted, she's learned first-hand the same pain of loss I felt when she took Ribari from me. I am satisfied with that. Besides, I am beginning to agree with Retsu-sama's premise. The boy in front of us is not Eiraki, nor is he Katsura, nor is he Keitarou. I won't have it said that Kuchiki endorse indiscriminate killing. I would rather see for myself what kind of man Kohaku intends to be before I pass any kind of judgement on him."

"I believe we should listen to his concerns," Retsu nodded. "First and foremost, as regards Rukongai — Kohaku-dono is clearly aware of people requiring our support. These are people we have overlooked, but we can still help, and we need the knowledge of people like Kohaku-dono to put that wrong to right."

"I agree," The Fifth District representative spoke up gravely. "I said it before, but I won't allow a word against this lad, no matter where he comes from. He saved my children from killing each other when he broke Keitarou's spell. For me, that's a good enough statement of intent, and Juushirou and Shunsui's support of him just bolsters that conviction. He has my trust... and I agree with Retsu-sama. We should utilise Kohaku's knowledge and his willingness to help us, rather than suspect him of crimes and push him away. You make enemies that way, and we don't need those, not with so much still to resolve."

"Then we should talk about Rukongai," Nagesu acquiesced. "If Kohaku is willing, I believe we should learn all we can about the people who Keitarou was protecting, and the conditions in which they lived."

"You won't... punish them, will you?" Kohaku was anxious, and Nagesu cast him a startled look. "They aren't criminals. They're desperate people. They would've starved, if not for Father's help in smuggling in food. He was all they had... that and Mother. Mother really cared about them. She considered them an extension of her own family in a lot of ways. They helped deliver us children, and Mother would have sooner died than let any harm come to them."

"Nobody in Rukongai will be harmed for helping Keitarou," Retsu shook her head. "My Division have sovereignty over what occurs there, now, and you have my word. It is our oversight, and we will amend it. We will look at the Rukon in much greater detail, and, with your help, I trust nobody else will go hungry. That is simply a short term measure — but from it can, perhaps, grow a long term solution."

"It isn't that shinigami don't care about Rukongai," Tokutarou added, "but we've been acting on faulty information. We believed, because official reports told us, that all the Rukon residents had been transferred to the Spiritless Zone. What happened to make that false, I don't know. Maybe we'll never get to the bottom of it, and maybe it's not important — but now we are aware, the Council will authorise shinigami patrols in Rukongai to encompass everyone equally."

"Then I will give you what information I can," Kohaku promised, his heart skipping a beat in his chest. "I want to help them too."

"Kohaku has expressed a desire to recruit as a shinigami, here in Seireitei," Juushirou interjected. "To do so, of course, would require your direct consent. He was not born in Seireitei, despite the fact his parents were. I think it would be the most sensible thing for him to recruit and remain under my auspices, where he can't cause offence or controversy among Clansfolk."

"Recruit? As a shinigami? From Rukongai?" Yuuichi blinked in disbelief, and Juushirou offered a benign smile.

"His exploits at the Senkai Gate resulted in him summoning a zanpakutou, Yuuichi-sama," he said composedly, "which I trust, at some point, he will be able to present before the Council of Elders for ratification. You have my word that, until that happens, he won't be allowed or able to use it — but I am strongly in favour of keeping an individual with that level of spirit power close to the heart of Seireitei's power base. It would be dangerous to him and to the ordinary residents of District villages if he were to be sent away, and if you returned him to Rukongai, there is no doubt in my mind now that his untrained reiryoku could cause infinite dangers to the residents there. As the Council has already judged him innocent of a crime, he cannot be locked away simply because we lack a mechanism to deal with this situation, and so flexibility seems the obvious answer. The only sensible and safe solution is that I keep him. I am more than willing to do that — and to continue to take responsibility for him as I would any of my squad. It relies on the word of this Council, though — because I am bound by its laws as much as any other citizen."

"You seem to bounce up and down on those rules enough to make a veritable trampoline out of them, Juushirou," Midori observed dryly, and Juushirou offered her an unrepentant smile.

"I don't think I'm taking much of a gamble, trusting someone who's already proven himself my ally," he said. "I'm like any Captain. I see a powerful potential addition to my squad and I want to capitalise on that opportunity before it slips away. Koku's made it clear that he wants to be acknowledged for his Rukon birth. That would make his recruitment to any Clan division unlikely, surely? But the Thirteenth doesn't have the strict requirements that Clan squads often have in terms of their recruitment. It would cause no scandal in my quarter of Seireitei. He would be fine with me, and it would mean the Council knew where he was and that he was properly being looked after. Thirteenth Division have an open recruitment policy. This would just extend that to a new, potential member base."

"Hold on," Yuuichi put up his hands. "Are you suggesting that we open the floodgates and start letting tainted Pluses come into Seireitei? Train? Recruit? You understand what kind of a precedent you want to set, Ukitake? If it begins here, where will it end?"

"With the absolute equality of citizens in Soul Society, if at all possible," Juushirou replied calmly, and Kohaku's eyes almost bugged out of his head, for the tension in the chamber was rising, yet Juushirou was somehow still cool as he had been before. "Of course, I'm not saying that's something that can be achieved right away. But, by rights, Kohaku should have been born in Seireitei. He was born in Rukongai because his parents were outlaws and chose to flee there. The Endou have discarded any connection to him, and if he is illegitimate, he is outside of the Clan degrees of both Endou and Urahara. Normally, that would make him District-born. Ordinary Plus Souls cannot have children, and babies ought not be born in Rukongai at all. The fact Kohaku was indicates he is not a Plus Soul and since my squad was set up to take in District shinigami, I think it obvious that Thirteenth is where he rightly belongs."

"There he goes again," Kyouki chuckled, and at her reaction, the atmosphere in the room began to dissipate. "He's got you there, Yuuichi-dono. I don't think we're in a position to have a free for all on Rukongai applications, not yet, and maybe not ever — but the very fact of Kohaku being born in the Rukon proves he's not a Plus Soul. He might want to be considered from Rukongai, and if that's his wish, that's his right — but in terms of our judgement, he is a District boy — an illegitimate Clan son outside of the Degrees of Clan."

"Even so, this is a boy who has had no formal training," Yuuichi objected. "I understand our own rules regarding District children, but Kyouki-sama, there isn't a single one who has joined any Seireitei squad who hasn't been trained by my kinsman at the Academy. Kohaku said himself he could not use shunpo. We know nothing of the sword he holds, or whether he would even be an asset to the Gotei. It's not normal for people, even in District Seireitei, to suddenly turn up at the door of a Division and ask to be let in."

“On the contrary, one such shinigami may have saved Mikihara Hyakken’s life,” Hirata interjected softly, and Yuuichi’s gaze slid over towards his fellow Clan leader in astonishment.

“Hirata-sama?”

“Seventh Division has one shinigami currently in shihakushou who has not been to the Academy, and who is not an Endou Clansman,” Hirata said evenly. “His position is, admittedly, of a trial nature, but his contributions important. Nagesu-sama, I believe you have met the man in question, this morning?”

“This morning?” Nagesu’s expression seemed to take on a look of sudden comprehension, and he nodded. “Yes, I believe so, though he failed to tell me that he was the hero of the hour at the Ninth during our meeting. I also understand that he has a sister... who is currently a registered recruit at Thirteenth, without having been through the Academy process?”

“Yes, sir,” Juushirou was slightly taken aback by this, Kohaku thought, but he recovered himself quickly, nodding his head. “Her paperwork has been finalised and I do not intend to give her up. She is a good, hard-working individual with unique talents and the rest will come with time. Clansfolk are not always required to have Academy training before they join a squad — I see no reason why they are any better placed, in modern society, to take up arms.”

“Juushirou, stop brutalising us,” Midori scolded. “You’ve made your point, and you don’t need to labour it. We all know, as Clansfolk, that there will need to be changes and regulations and new rules will probably come into place as a result of all these recent events. Until then, all bets are off.”

“I think it would be as well if Ukitake-taichou took the boy and trained him,” Retsu said thoughtfully. “He clearly has formed a bond with Kohaku-dono, and that is important. Thirteenth is a different kind of squad to a Clan squad and nobody could confuse Kohaku’s status if he were there. I believe it best he stay and be made a formal member of Thirteenth Division. I will ratify the papers myself, if need be, to bring this matter to a close.”

“I second it,” Kyouki raised her hand casually, offering Yuuichi a playful smile. “I think its a good match, and it will keep Juushirou suitably occupied.”

“You make me sound like a naughty child, Kyouki-sama,” Juushirou objected, and Kyouki laughed.

“I remember the impetuous stripling who waved his swords around without knowing what they were for,” she said comfortably, and to Kohaku’s astonishment, Juushirou’s cheeks flushed red. “You’ll knock it into this one, I’m sure, what a sword is and isn’t to be used for. I told you, I’m rooting for the kid to do well. And besides, I think we could spend all day here arguing about it, but I know you won’t give up and go home until you get what you want. In this case, we ought to give it... because otherwise, the Council will have to find other provision for the boy, and probably nothing so suitable.”

“Then we are accepting the idea of Kohaku recruiting with the Thirteenth?” Nagesu asked.

“A probationary recruitment,” Guren tempered cautiously. “I said I wouldn’t prejudice the boy, and I won’t, but I want to see his sword, his motivation and his suitability in uniform before we decide something permanent we can’t later take back. I vote we continue to monitor this new Rukon recruit. And, also, that if the other District recruit — the young girl you seem to know about, Nagesu-dono — wishes to remain in uniform, she too should be called upon to prove herself before the Council at some point. We ask for all new shinigami to come to ratify their zanpakutou. I vote that we also require proof of their training and education as shinigami at the same time.”

“Meaning...?” Midori frowned, and Guren shrugged.

“Those who recruit from the Academy pass examinations to do so,” he said simply. “I think it as well that all new recruits prove they can do the same, in the basic arts of a shinigami, before their probation be lifted.”

“Whilst Clan sons enter their Divisions without needing anything, not even a proper sword?” Juushirou demanded. “With respect, Guren-sama, do you think that to be a fair judgement?”

“You forget yourself, Ukitake,” Guren offered a flinty smile. “I am intending my suggestion to cover all shinigami who do not attend the Academy. My Vice Captain has already raised with me, since our return from the Real World, the large gaps in knowledge and experience suffered by recruits who do not undertake Genryuusai-sama’s training regimen. I intend to make it law in District Six that all Kuchiki outside of the central line will be enrolled and properly trained — and those that are not will have to be rigorously proven to be suitable before they can enter my squad, let alone accept high rank there. You will remember that I have imposed such rules before — when Shirogane was your shishou, and why he was selected for that task.”

“I’m sorry, sir,” Juushirou looked abashed. “I had forgotten, but you’re right.”

“I cannot impose the same rules on all Clans,” Guren added. “but if at least we demand some kind of proof of usefulness before this court in future, for all recruits — whether from Genryuusai-sama or from our own houses — then we will be much better equipped. And there must be no exceptions — which means that, until Kohaku can prove himself educated and competent in these arts, his status as your recruit can be revoked if he contravenes the standards we expect from our shinigami, without the normal, lengthy procedures of discipline taking place. Does that sound acceptable to you?”

“I suppose it does, but...”

“I accept the terms, Guren-sama,” Kohaku did not know he was going to speak until he had, and his cheeks flushed a deeper red than Juushirou’s at the sudden attention of the Kuchiki leader. “I know what my mother did to you, and I know that its something that can never be forgiven. Even despite that you’re treating me fairly, and I’m grateful. My father didn’t understand shinigami at all, and nor did I, not till I came here — but now I do. Being a shinigami means sacrificing the things you want to do for the things that are right to do, and that’s what I need to do now. I betrayed my father because I wanted to stop people from dying. That’s what I need to keep doing. So I accept your terms. If it means I can stay here and work and learn things from Ukitake-dono and the others, I accept. I will not be found wanting. You have my word.”

“I suppose that settles your doubts, then, Juushirou,” Kyouki observed. “The boy himself has spoken and he accepts. I think Guren-sama’s suggestion is a logical one. We still have to examine these issues more closely, but I will also second his proposal. I had intended a similar set of regulations within Fifth, having seen how Sora’s ability to withstand this attack put her in such a strong position. I am already filling in paperwork to send my eldest grandson to the Academy come the new academic year — Seikyou is sixteen and too young for squad life, and I am only glad that he didn’t have to witness his father’s death before I realised my foolishness in taking him to the Real World. Times are changing, we must too. Seikyou will go to study, and so will all young Shiba shinigami from now on, regardless of their position in the Clan.”

She cast Juushirou a smile.

“This whelp belongs to you now, though,” she added. “Make him into a shinigami Thirteenth can be proud of. I’m looking forward to seeing what can be done with Seireitei's first Rukongai shinigami."

"In which case, Kyouki-sama, we have another matter we'd like to raise before the Council," Juushirou cast Kohaku a glance, then turned his attention back to the senior Clan figures, a grave look in his eye. "It concerns the fate of the Eighth Seat of the Seventh Division, Kotetsu Tenichi, and the Council's plans for his formal trial."

Author's Note: Kizashi and Moe

This doesn't make a lot of sense in English, but it does in Japanese.

Moe's name, as a Vaizard, was written in katakana, detaching him from his real identity and, in some ways, "dehumanising" him. However, this chapter revealed his true name. As Haruya mentioned in an earlier chapter, Moe was not illegitimate, but was discarded by his father due to his imperfections. The name, "Kizashi", is read with the kanji, 萌. The alternative reading of this character is "Moe". Hence, Urahara Kizashi = Moe.

Daigo chose this tag-name for him, to conceal the truth of the deal he had made with the boy's father. For all his other problems, Moe had significant spirit power and was intelligent — as I hope his fight with Kyouki illustrated. What he became — the animal, rather than the man — reflected his treatment and the cruelty of his upbringing, rather than necessarily his nature. Kyouki may have been "prey", but Haruya and Aki were "family", and, as mentioned before, Haruya was the only one who could control Moe's actions.

IMO, the real monster was not Moe, but his father, and it illustrates the compounded problems that the Urahara, despite all of Nagesu's hard work, are still battling to overcome. I don't know whether in canon, Kisuke's family ever really were Great Nobility, but his involvement with Midori and the apparent absence of any of his own family makes me suspect he might well be the lone survivor of a family who, ultimately, was so fractured it ended up destroying itself almost completely.

Nagesu is a Clan leader that bucks this trend, and, although he is a calm and peaceable man, has the strength to stick to his convictions, even if the truth hurts him. At least for now, the family is likely to be set at some level of peace, whatever it will eventually face.

76. Witness For The Defence

Chapter Seventy Four: Witness For The Defence

The courtroom was busier than he had expected it to be.

As Tenichi was led up and along the narrow walkway by one of the Onmitsukidou's lesser officers, he cast his gaze apprehensively around at his surroundings in an attempt to take in exactly where he was and what he was facing. This was not the Council Chamber, but nor was it a place which was usually open to crowds, and as he took his place in the centre of the chamber, he squinted into the darkness, trying to make out more than just the faint blurry outlines of heads and shoulders in the gloom beyond.

The Onmitsukidou's courtroom had been built initially by Midori when she had been establishing herself as Head of Second District, and had initially been intended to be used as a neutral location to deal with Clan related matters. When Kai had taken charge of the Second's secret forces, however, the necessity of a place to try criminals before sentencing them to the lower reaches of what was, had Tenichi but known it, a fast expanding Maggot's Nest program, had meant that it had been turned over almost entirely to the Onmitsukidou's care. Gone were the days when all criminals were simply hauled up before the Council of Elders to plead their case — for in less than thirty years, the Onmitsukidou had established itself as the Gotei's unofficial police force, and, in some cases, judge and jury. Despite his distant origins, Tenichi was not Clan, therefore he had had no Clan kinsman to put in a word for him, to pay a fine or to take him off to the family's own court for a lighter and more sympathetic hearing. Instead, he would be tried here, and his justice would be delivered by the Onmitsukidou's overall official leader and guardian, the Second Division Captain herself.

Kai might be Head of the Onmitsukidou in all other respects, but he was still only Midori's Vice Captain, and, as he saw the lithe figure of the Second District Clan leader make her way to take the seat across the chamber from him, Tenichi felt every tendon and ligament in his body tighten up with sudden tension. Midori was known for her fairness, but also her vigilante ruthlessness against those who had crossed the system, and there was no reading anything into the young woman's golden eyes as she took her place, settling herself with impeccable, solemn calm as she waited for the proceedings to begin.

Her personal appearance in this case was not lost on Tenichi. It was a case in which there were still questions of overall treason, and in which his life was very much still on the line. Kai had interrogated him, and therefore Kai's judgement was not objective enough for him to pass judgement, not when the life of a Vice Captain had been lost. Despite his resolve, Tenichi felt a flicker of rear lurch in his stomach. The next moment a bright light shone down around him, momentarily dazzling him, and with a thud and a clunk, four wooden fences shot up from the floor beneath his feet to surround him on all sides, locking him firmly into his position to prevent him from running. Though he ought to have been further frightened by this sudden enclosure, Tenichi felt somehow relieved, as for a moment he had felt certain his legs would become too unsteady for him to stand on his own, and he reached trembling fingers out to grasp the wood rail in front of him, trusting his weight to it instead of to his own failing limbs.

The audience benches were hidden from his view by the darkness that pervaded most of the chamber, but Tenichi knew there were eyes on him. Were they judging him? Were they sympathetic? The cuffs at his wrists meant that Tenichi was unable to discern individual reiatsu, and he did not know whether the spectators were friends or foes. Along the edges of the central dais, where he stood, he could make out black uniformed Onmitsukidou officers, each armed with an asauchi sword, and he knew that if the verdict was a bad one, or he displeased the court, he could probably be cut down there and then in full view of everyone.

His heart lurched in his throat at this horrific thought, and his grip on the wooden beam tightened.

I don't want to die.

Tears glittered on his lashes as this realisation began to take hold of his frightened body.

I don't want to die. Whatever I've done, whatever they think of me... I don't want to die. I'm not ready... I'm not brave enough to die. I'm not ready. I don't... I don't...

“Kotetsu Tenichi,”

The sound of his name broke through his hysteria, and he turned almost blindly, making out the familiar figure of the Onmitsukidou leader as he stepped between his officers and paused a foot or so from where Tenichi was imprisoned. “You have been arrested by the Onmitsukidou on suspicion of assault against a recruit of the Thirteenth Division, Ichimaru Izumi. You are also suspected of collusion with an enemy of Seireitei, Aizen Keitarou. These charges have been discussed with you, and you have been adjudged of sound mind to answer to them. Here, now, before the Shadow Court, the evidence will be weighed and you will be judged. Do you understand?"

"Yes, sir," Somehow Tenichi managed words. "I understand."

"Do you plead guilty or not guilty to the crimes you have been charged with?"

A moment of hesitation, and Tenichi felt as though the entire chamber was holding its breath along with him, although he could not see the expressions on the faces of those who surrounded him. Initially at a loss, Tenichi caught Kai's sombre golden gaze, and something in its depths reminded him of the unsympathetic yet somehow reassuring instructions this man had given him when he had first fallen into Onmitsukidou hands. He took a breath, settling himself, then, in more composed tones, he spoke.

"In the case of the assault on Ichimaru-san, I admit my guilt," he said frankly. "In the case of the other, I plead not guilty. I am not a traitor to Seireitei."

There was the faintest glimmer of approval in Kai's eyes at his response, before the older man turned away, moving to face his sister, and bowing his head before her as though they did not share a close sibling bond.

"Midori-sama, the accused has stated his position," he said softly. "In the case of the assault against Ichimaru Izumi, he has pleaded guilty. Do you wish to hear evidence relating to this case?"

"Only if it explains the logic of a man launching an unprovoked attack on an unarmed young woman in the safety of her own Division grounds," Midori's words were cutting, and all the courage Tenichi thought he had mustered was swept aside by just one glance from her amber eyes. "Kotetsu, speak up for yourself. You admit the assault, and so I would like to hear your rationale. Be aware, I will not accept momentarily lapses in sanity. If you are sound to stand trial, you are sound to judge right from wrong and you will get no sympathy from me if you try to use that argument."

"No, ma'am," Tenichi's palms were sweating so much now that they were slipping against the wood of the beam, but somehow he held himself together, bowing his head. "I realise my conduct was irrational and reckless and I take full responsibility for it. I had mistakenly believed Ichimaru-san to be a spy for the enemy, Aizen Keitarou, and instead of reporting to my superior officer, I took it upon myself to address the situation personally.”

“Is there a reason why you did not approach your Captain with your suspicions — or even Ichimaru-san’s Captain?” Midori demanded, and Tenichi hesitated, before shaking his head.

“I was foolish and I took the judgement upon myself,” he said simply. “I realise now that I was mistaken and that Ichimaru-san and her brother were associates of my Captain who I should have been able to trust. I deeply regret the choice I made, and am willing to be punished for it.”

“Well, in that respect, you are fortunate that the girl escaped with her life,” Midori did not sound in the least sympathetic, and Tenichi realised that he had done himself no favours by attacking an unarmed woman. Midori had a fearsome reputation for martial and military skill, and was a strong believer in the increase of female participation in the Gotei. Attacking a female recruit would have been an immediate black mark on his case, he realised dully, even if it had not been accompanied by everything else.

“Midori-sama, Ichimaru-san agrees that the attack was made in error, and that there was misunderstanding over her position in the Gotei,” Kai spoke now, his words still carefully deferential. “Ukitake-taichou and Kyouraku-taichou and I had been investigating the possibility of a spy within the Gotei, and it seems clear that Kotetsu believed that Ichimaru-san was this spy. It has been proven that she was not, and Kotetsu has expressed regret for his actions since this has been proven to him. Ichimaru-san does not speak, but via her brother, she has requested that Kotetsu be treated with some mercy in this case as a result.”

The girl had done what?

Tenichi’s eyes widened in disbelief at this, and Midori’s lips thinned, but she nodded.

“Then I will bear that in mind,” she said with a sigh. “In the meantime, we have a more serious charge to address. On which you claim innocence of, Kotetsu. You have already mentioned that you believed there was a spy in the Gotei? Tell me, how did you come by this information?”

“From Suzuki Naoto, Midori-sama.”

“Suzuki...” Midori’s eyes became slits. “I see. Tell me how you came to be acquainted with a man who the rest of Soul Society believed to have died ten years ago?"

"He was the man who took me hostage in Inner Seireitei, and dragged me to Rukongai, ma'am." Tenichi said honestly.

"And he chose to tell you sensitive information about Keitarou's activity as a light story to pass the time?" There was sarcasm in the young woman's voice, and Tenichi flinched at the sound of it, shaking his head.

"No, ma'am. He used it as a threat against me and my brother. He said that Keitarou had someone watching us, and that if I didn't keep my mouth shut, then it would be trouble for both of us."

He swallowed hard, then,

"He came to my quarters, once, the night that Souja-dono disappeared," he whispered. "I didn't know anything about my Vice Captain's disappearance then, but he told me that Souja-dono had gone to Rukongai. And that he would be killed there, because Keitarou wouldn't allow him to come back alive. He said I should be glad, because if Souja-dono found out I'd been in Keitarou's company, Ketsui and I would be in danger. And then, at Seventh, when he and I fought, he made the same threats again — towards Ketsui and towards me."

"Kai, have you spoken to Ketsui-dono?" Midori's gaze flitted to her brother, and Kai nodded.

"Yes, but on the agreement he would not be called before this court today," he said matter-of-factly. "I am satisfied that he was ignorant of everything that Tenichi-dono describes, and that his only knowledge of his brother's situation came when he interrupted the attack on Ichimaru-san's life. As a result, Ukitake-taichou requested he not be asked to testify against his own brother, and I gave authorisation. It seems clear that Kotetsu Ketsui can add nothing to this story that we do not already know."

"Soft," Midori clicked her tongue against her teeth disapprovingly, turning her attention back to Tenichi.

"Very well. In that case, I will simply have to probe you further. You said that Suzuki used your time in Rukongai as a threat against you, and yet you claim you were taken hostage. If you were genuinely a hostage, why would you have concerns about a report reaching our ears? You were not the first hostage taken. Why would this concern you to such a degree that you would choose to act in a reckless, violent manner?"

Tenichi swallowed hard, then,

“Because I wasn’t a prisoner in Rukongai, Midori-sama,” he admitted unwillingly, and a collective gasp went up from the shadowy stalls. “I mean, I was taken there against my will, but when I was there, Keitarou did not confine me. He let me walk around among his people and see them for myself. And I understood that... because I had been treated that way, it would look... bad. Keitarou is my kinsman. He and my father were first cousins, and Keitarou came after me specifically for that reason. He wanted my help to feed the starving people in Rukongai. He promised to take me to my Father’s grave, and he told me what happened when Father died. Everything he told me was confirmed by someone else that was present when Father was buried. He tried to treat me as a friend and an ally, and so when I heard Souja-dono had gone to Rukongai, I really believed that he... had got the wrong idea about why I was there. I thought he’d think that I was complicit in the murders in Rukongai.”

“But your Vice Captain was killed,” Midori cut ruthlessly across his explanation, her gold eyes icy. “And Suzuki told you you should be glad. Souja-dono never did give a full statement about what he discovered in Rukongai. You are the only witness to these events... and we only have your story to claim that you were never part of Keitarou’s operations. Your behaviour on your return is suspicious, Kotetsu. I know that you were apprehensive in the search for Souja-dono, although you participated in it, and that your actions since his death have been more and more erratic. You confessed to my brother that you felt responsible for his death — correct?”

Tenichi wilted under the intensity of the Clan leader’s stare, nodding mutely, and Midori’s expression became predatory.

“I also know you claimed amnesia for the time in Rukongai, which we now know was a lie,” she said softly. “Lying is a defence mechanism to protect one from something unpleasant or untoward. An innocent man has no reason to lie. Moreover, I have no reason to believe your brother needed or wanted your protection in this manner. He is an upstanding member of Seireitei’s community... did you think how much this action would hurt and shame him more than anyone else? Seeing you here like this, answering questions in such a way that makes your conduct and predicament sound like his fault... that is not the mark of an honourable man.”

“I beg pardon, Midori-sama, but that’s not the case,” Tenichi scabbled together the last vestiges of his courage, though he could feel the tears welling once more in his eyes at the harshness in her words. "I don't consider it Ketsui's fault. The fault is mine. All of it is mine. I'm not trying to push the blame on anyone else."

"Yet you're pleading not guilty," Midori did not relent for a moment. "You are either complicit or you are not, surely?"

"Midori-sama," before Tenichi could find a response, Kai raised his hand, approaching the Clan Leader and gesturing that he had something he wanted to tell her. He lowered his voice so that Tenichi could not hear him, but at whatever he said, Midori looked thoughtful, then she nodded her head, almost in resignation. Kai looked relieved, then stepped away, gesturing to the guard that stood nearest a little side door that flanked the main hall. The guard saluted, then moved to open the door, and Tenichi's heart almost froze in his chest as he saw a slim figure step out from behind it, robed in plain beige and brown and with his dark hair tied in a neat tail behind his head.

Koku?

He did not meet Tenichi's gaze, but nor did he avoid it, instead moving to stand between the accused and the judge and bowing his head low before her.

"Midori-sama, I would like to speak in this matter, with your permission," he spoke quietly and politely, and Tenichi could barely hear him over the sound of his own palpitating heartbeat.

"You may speak," Midori gave a gesture of permission, and the young man raised his head, turning to glance at Tenichi almost apologetically for a moment, before returning his attention to the judge.

"I am aware of your name and identity," Midori continued. "But not everyone here present has made your acquaintance. For their sake, state your name and your reason for wanting to speak in this case. It is unusual for a witness to volunteer themselves before the Shadow Court, and your reasons for doing so must be made clear to all."

"Yes, ma'am," The young man bowed again, and Tenichi was aware of him taking a deep breath, as though gathering his courage.

"My name is Aizen Kohaku," he said, flooring Tenichi once and for all by this honest admission. "I am Keitarou's second son, and I was assigned to watch Tenichi-dono during his time in Rukongai. I am aware both of his mindset then and since he returned to Soul Society, and I can prove that he was not complicit in my father's schemes to attack Seireitei."

Aizen... Kohaku.

Tenichi's eyes had almost bugged out of their sockets, as the air around him became thicker and harder to breathe.

The monster in the hut? The demon you wouldn't tell me about? Oh, but I said such harsh things... I talked of it so negatively. Why did I not consider that possibility? Why didn't I think that you might be Kohaku... and why did I say those things before you? No wonder you looked so sad when I did... and yet you're here, in the open, in front of everyone? Something must have happened since I was imprisoned, something nobody's told me about. Keitarou is dead, that much at least filtered down — but that you had turned to the Gotei's side... and that you were planning on doing even this... why didn't I know?

As though he had sensed Tenichi's confusion, Kohaku turned to face him, offering him a faint, reassuring smile. As he did so, Tenichi was reminded of another conversation.

"I just thought you should know... since we're allies, albeit in silence."

His own words echoed through his mind, and then, like a splash of cold water, Kohaku's own reluctant response.

"I wish you hadn't ever called us that, but since it's true, I have to honour it as well."

Is that why you're doing this? You still think of us as allies, even though I knew nothing at all about you, and you're standing defending a man who didn't listen to a single piece of advice you gave? More, who tried to kill you... will you tell them that, too?

"You seem surprised, Kotetsu," Midori's acerbic tones broke through his thoughts once more. "Kohaku has requested to speak on your behalf, yet am I to assume you were not aware of his true identity?"

"No, ma'am," Tenichi spoke numbly. "I was not."

"Well, then a lot of interesting information is coming out in this hearing," Midori settled herself more comfortably. "Kohaku, I would like you to tell the court what you told the Council, in as much detail as you can. This is a proper trial and whilst your own situation here in Seireitei is stable, I want you to remember that treason is frowned upon at the greatest level. If you lie to protect Kotetsu, the protection offered to you might easily be rescinded. Do you understand?"

"Yes, ma'am, but I have no intention of lying, so I think it's all right," Kohaku replied simply. "It's as I said. The man you call Suzuki Naoto kidnapped Tenichi-dono by force from Inner Seireitei and brought him unconscious back to Rukongai. He cuffed him so that he wasn't able to sense spiritual auras, and Father assigned me to watch over him. Tenichi-dono did not choose to come to Rukongai, nor was he particularly happy about staying there. He was suspicious of Father's attentions. At this time, my brother and sister were dispatched to murder the people in the Spiritless Zone. I didn't know about this event until it was underway, through my particular spirit power, and so there was no way for Tenichi to know about it at all and Father never told him about it. My sister saw him as an enemy and tried on one occasion to kill him, but I prevented it because I knew Father wanted him to stay alive. The only thing Father asked of Tenichi-dono was help to feed the Rukongai strays who were starving, but Tenichi-dono made no further contact with Rukongai or Father regarding this after he was released. Father took Tenichi-dono, put him in a situation that resembled his own memories of being a refugee, and appealed to his sense of justice. But he did not involve Tenichi-dono in any of his other schemes."

He paused, pursing his lips thoughtfully.

"I have come to review many things since Father died," he admitted unevenly. "One of them is his belief that Tenichi-dono would become his ally. I sometimes have visions of things that have not happened yet, and these can be easy to interpret wrongly. For this reason, I think maybe I mistakenly led him to believe Tenichi would join his side. Tenichi's kidnap may have inadvertently been my fault, for I realised, when I was here in Seireitei, that Tenichi-dono was going to be my ally. Not Father's."

"Can you explain what Kohaku means by that, Kotetsu?" Midori asked, and Tenichi jumped almost out of his skin as attention swung back his way once more. "How so were you 'allies'?"

"After Souja-dono was brought back to Seireitei, I saw him at Thirteenth," Tenichi spoke unsteadily. "After that, I went and spoke to Ko... Kohaku. He promised not to talk about my being in Rukongai and I promised not to reveal that he had come from there. In that respect, I wilfully deceived Soul Society and I admit it. But Kohaku had helped Souja-dono where I couldn't. And, more, he knew how Souja-dono died. He knew who attacked him, when and how... and he told me that it wasn't my doing or my fault. Keitarou didn't order it. It wasn't because of my being there, it was an opportunistic murder and even Keitarou didn't know it was going to happen. Only... Only Suzuki wouldn't let up on me, because he felt I knew too much."

"Suzuki Naoto also attempted to kill me, because he believed I'd allied with Tenichi-dono over my Father, and had turned against Father's wishes," Kohaku added. "In the end, perhaps he was right. I didn't realise it, then, but I suppose that is, ultimately, what I did."

"Do you know where Suzuki is now, Kohaku?" Kai asked, and Kohaku shook his head.

"When he attacked me, I accidentally flared my spirit power and it broke the hold Father had over his spirit," he said gravely. "I realised then for the first time that I was capable of breaking Chudokuga's spell. I also knew that Suzuki had been one of Father's puppets and that he was not acting under his own will. When he left my chamber, he didn't know who I was or who Father was, either. My reiryoku overloaded and I blacked out after the attack. I don't know where he went. That's the truth."

"And in terms of Tenichi-dono?"

"I advised him to stay out of the whole business," Kohaku said frankly, and Tenichi went red. "He didn't listen. I know that when you love someone a lot, you'll do stupid things if you think it will keep them safe. It's hard, losing someone you love. I think Tenichi-dono acted because he thought Father would've hurt Ketsui-dono instead. And the truth is, Midori-sama, I think if Father had been able to pursue his ultimate ends, he would have done that. He intended to kill Thirteenth Division. All of them. Every last one. But I think he would've tried to take Ketsui-dono, and maybe he would have made a puppet of him, making him kill his fellows before letting him die. It's something Father has done before. I heard you say that Ketsui-dono didn't need protecting, and as a shinigami, I'm sure that's true. But as a person, it's harder when something you care about is in the equation. Father also killed Ichimaru-san's family. He didn't know about Ichimaru-san and nor did I until I came here — but he did hurt Ichimaru-san's brother. I think he might have used Ketsui-dono to try and kill Ichimaru-san. Tenichi-dono did stupid things and I won't pretend he didn't. But my father... unless you knew my father well, Midori-sama, you can't possibly understand how deep his thought processes ran. Every person was a piece on a chessboard to him. I was probably the person closest to him — closer in some ways than Mother was... but I don't know whether I was ever any more than just his pawn, either. I don't think Tenichi-dono did the right things, but I know he wouldn't have willingly joined with Father in destroying Seireitei. Or in killing Souja-dono. Tenichi-dono respected Souja-dono. And besides, the one who couldn't save Souja-dono wasn't Tenichi-dono, but me. I was there, but I couldn't shunpo and I reached the scene too late. I'm more guilty than Tenichi-dono, yet Hirata-sama hasn't found me culpable. If I'm not, surely Tenichi-dono can't be, either? He was in the wrong place at the wrong time, and Father played on that and on his past. That's all."

Tenichi drew breath into his lungs, struggling to follow the thread of the conversation, but it was becoming something of a blur. Midori had responded to Kohaku's words, but he could not longer make sense of the syllables. He was losing his grip on his surroundings, he realised dully, struggling to maintain his hold on the wooden frame as though it were the only thing keeping him from dropping into a dead faint in the middle of the courtroom. All the shock and pressure that had piled up on him, all the self-accusation and blame had been swept away by Kohaku's simple, honest account, and yet the relief he ought to have felt was absent. Instead was a dark, yawning hollow... and the memory that he had raised his sword to his brother — the person he had most sought to protect.

"Kotetsu, are you listening?" Kai's words in his ear brought him sharply back into focus, and he started, staring at the Onmitsukidou leader blankly. Kai eyed him wryly, reaching out to thwap him across the back of the head. As he did so, he realised Kohaku was gone. Had he blacked out for a moment, or had he just been so lost in his own thoughts that he had not seen the young man depart? He was still fathoming this when Kai spoke again.

"Wake up," he instructed. "Midori-neesama is about to pass her judgement, and it's usual for the felon to be conscious for the verdict."

Immediately the tension crashed back over Tenichi's body, his every limb stiffening in anticipation and sudden fear, and Midori got to her feet, moving towards him with an unreadable expression on her face.

"If you were in my Division, I would probably have you removed for idiocy," she said disparagingly. "Or whipped, or both. Listening to all of this has been nauseating to say the least. Still, thanks to Kohaku's testimony and the evidence my brother has gleaned, at least I can dismiss the charges of treason. I agree with your appraisal, Kotetsu. You are not guilty of wilfully betraying Seireitei, nor are you culpable in the death of your Vice Captain. Although you are very guilty of being a complete nincompoop, sadly there's no sentence I can award that covers that particular sin. In terms of the accusations of treason and your withholding evidence, I have decided in the circumstances to dismiss the charges completely. You are clearly not intelligent enough to conspire with someone like Keitarou, and I am sure he was not a foolish enough man to select an associate like you."

Tenichi winced at the cutting criticism, but Midori was not finished.

“You have pled guilty on the other charge, and here I will sentence you,” she continued. “You will spend a minimum of five years in labour confinement, at the end of which you will be brought to a review before my brother and he will decide whether you are fit to be released. I have had enough of you, so I’ll pass that responsibility on to him instead. I understand that Seventh Division intend to keep you — though I can’t for one moment imagine why — and so when you are released, you will return to Hirata-dono’s care. Be warned... you might think that he’s been merciful, but I am quite certain that, if you cause him or his squad any further embarrassment, you will learn that being judged by a Shihouin court is relatively tame in comparison to upsetting an Endou one. Do you understand the sentence you have been given, and the restrictions placed upon you, Kotetsu?”

“Y... Yes... Midori-sama,” Somehow Tenichi managed to form words, for the strain of the whole situation had finally reached its limits and he knew that, if he dared to try and move in any direction, he would simply collapse in a heap on the ground.

“Then the case is settled. Kai, he’s all yours,” Midori dismissed the situation with a flick of her wrist, and, as the four wooden frames began to judder and pull back, Tenichi found that he was surrounded once more by Onmitsukidou officers. This time they took hold of him roughly in their arms, and though they more or less dragged him from the dock, Tenichi felt certain that Kai had given the order for them to do so in order to prevent him from humiliating himself further by physically fainting. His vision was a sea of dots and sparkles, nothing quite in focus, yet at the back of it all, dimly he understood that his life was not over.

He had been foolish, and his punishment was far from finished, but one day he would get a second chance. And, as Kai gave orders to have him taken to a particular cell in a particular cell block, Tenichi inwardly made a fierce promise with himself that, no matter what, he would not waste it.

Like Kai-dono said, the biggest challenge is living. I’ll live with the shame of what I’ve done my whole life, but I won’t let it destroy me. Even if nobody forgives me, if I don’t forgive myself, I’ll never heal. And if I don’t heal, I’m no use to Endou-taichou or anyone else. If Koku can make harsh decisions and stand before the Gotei for mercy, then I can pull myself together and not let anything like this happen again. I’ve changed, but it doesn’t have to be a bad change. So I’ll make it a good one. And, eventually, when I hold my sword again — it will be to defend people properly, not to run and attack out of fear.

It was over.

Kohaku sank down onto the grass outside of the Second Division penal compound, letting out his breath in a rush as he attempted to calm his still pounding heart. It had not been easy, standing in the midst of all that suppressed reiatsu, and talking in such candid terms about events that had happened such a short time before. Though he had done it before the Council, bringing up his Father's name had reminded him all over again of how alone he now was in the world. When they had arrived, Juushirou had insisted on enquiring with Kai after Eiraki's health, but Kohaku had already known that there was little point. His mother was alive, but he had sensed the light going out in her soul the same moment she learned of Keitarou's death. Katsura was far away, Sakaki buried deep beneath Rukongai soil. Even the former Onmitsukidou had disappeared into the shadows from whence he had come, and the thought was a sobering one.

Kirio-san, Juushirou-dono, they're kind to me, but this isn't where I come from. I don't know anything, and in there, I know they were all looking at me and judging me. Standing before the Council was one thing, but Juushirou-dono was with me. Today, I was alone. Midori-sama is a frightening woman, and the kind who would kill a traitor rather than look at him. I felt it so clearly in there... even if her brother isn't that way, she is. And Tenichi-dono's reaction to my real name... I hadn't thought that he might not have been told. I hope he doesn't think what I did in there was intended as any kind of betrayal. I wanted to help and I think I did, but I might have put a wedge between us, too, now he knows how deeply I lied.

He sighed, running his fingers idly through the blades and watching as they nudged aside a clump to reveal small purple flowers beneath. Gently he touched them, a bittersweet expression on his face.

I don't even know what these flowers are called. I feel like an alien, stuck in an alien world. I've sacrificed everything and I did the right thing, but now I'm alone and afraid. When Juushirou-dono is there, it doesn't seem so bad... but now, when he's not...

"Kohaku!"

As he raised his gaze towards the blue sky, he was aware of someone calling his name, and he turned, his eyes widening in surprise as he registered the fair headed Ketsui hurrying across the grass towards him, a young woman in tow. Although he could not remember their meeting, Kohaku was sure that he had felt her reiatsu at some point before, but before he could reason it out and work out where, Ketsui had reached his side, flopping down onto the grass beside him.

“Taichou is speaking to Midori-sama about Ten-nii, and he sent me to find you and make sure you didn’t get lost,” he explained, offering the bewildered stray a rueful smile. “He thought you’d have left the courtroom already, and he was right. You didn’t like it in there, huh?”

“It was stuffy and full of different spiritual auras,” Kohaku shook his head. “I found it hard to breathe. I wanted to help Tenichi-dono, but I was glad to get out.”

“I’m sure,” Ketsui pressed his lips together, then, to Kohaku’s surprise, he reached out his hand, grasping the younger man’s in his and giving it a firm, warm shake before releasing it. “What you did in there, I can never repay you for. My brother’s life was on the line, and there’s no doubt that what you had to say turned the scale. Ten-nii is alive because you were brave enough to go stand up and speak... and I appreciate it. I’m no wordsmith, so I don’t think I can be really eloquent about it — but I wanted you to know that I appreciate every word you said.”

“Ketsui-dono,” Kohaku’s eyes became huge, but before he could say anything else, the young woman had joined them, letting out an amused snort. To Kohaku’s astonishment, she grabbed hold of Ketsui’s tail of fluffy fair hair, giving it a speculative tug before dropping daintily down on the grass opposite Kohaku’s own position.

“You’re going to freak the guy out if you flap all over him like that, Ketsui,” she scolded, offering Kohaku a grin. “Hi Kohaku. I would say I’m pleased to meet you, only I already did — just I don’t suppose you remember me doing that, do you? I fell over your legs in the middle of Seireitei the day of the invasion... I’m glad to see you’re less dusty and in more or less one piece now.”

Kohaku’s cheeks flushed scarlet at this casual assessment, as suddenly he remembered where he had sensed the woman’s reiatsu before. It had been lingering around his body and his sword, when he had awoken in the chamber following Keitarou’s death, and more, it had been there, out in the ether, in the moments he had slipped out of consciousness.

“And you said I’m going to freak him out,” Ketsui scolded. “Kohaku, don’t let her embarrass you. If she hadn’t tripped over your legs, she’d have got herself into a messy battle situation and she’d be in even more trouble with her Captain than she already is, so she ought to be thanking you too.”

"I... see..." Kohaku gazed between the two shinigami, completely not seeing, and at his expression, the young woman let out a peal of laughter.

"Oh, I'm sorry," she said contritely. "Taichou did say that you weren't all that used to having lots of people around you. I guess we're a bit more than you were expecting after your little appearance — but since I came here with Ketsui for moral support today, I thought I ought to come out and help him keep tabs on you till Juushirou-dono is done inside. I know you more or less belong to Thirteenth now, but I didn't think you were sufficiently indoctrinated yet to discriminate against people from other squads."

Her eyes sparkled, and she held out a thin, dainty hand towards his.

"My name is Magaki Shizuka," she added. "I'm the Tenth Seat of the Eighth Division, and Ketsui and I are old school friends. I've known Tenichi-san a long time, too, so I'm glad you helped him, too. It's been a bad time, but hopefully, now, it will get better."

"Magaki-san," Slowly Kohaku closed his fingers around hers, shaking her hand tentatively before releasing his hold, and Shizuka beamed, nodding her head.

"There, now we're properly introduced, I feel less bad stumbling over you," she admitted, sitting back on her hands with a grin. "I saw you and your sword and clean thought you were a shinigami already — imagine my surprise when I found out who you really were... and what you'd been up to. Vandalising a Senkaimon is a pretty big deal. I'm sure Nagesu-sama had plenty to say about it."

"Nagesu-sama didn't say anything about it at all, really," Kohaku looked surprised. "About my father, yes, but not so much the Senkaimon. Besides, I had to do it. If I hadn't... if not..."

"I know," Shizuka's pretty features became grave. "You said it again in there — that Keitarou wanted to kill a lot of people, including Thirteenth. I'm sorry. I'm saying insensitive things, aren't I? You lost your father... it's not a celebration for you that Seireitei's finally at peace."

"Kohaku will stay with us now, though," Ketsui said firmly. "Kirio-nee has said it too, and so has Taichou. We'll look after him, Shizu. We're not going to just cast him out to fend for himself. He's done more for all of us than most of us have managed to do for each other and so we'll make sure that he's all right from this point on."

"So will I," Shizuka objected. "I told Taichou and Sora-dono that I wanted to come and be involved in that, too. I think it would be horrible, to lose one's father in that way... and well, I..."

She faltered, looking awkward, and Kohaku's eyes widened as he read the deep concern in the dark brown eyes. Somewhere, he knew, he had seen those eyes before, and then, as he put the pieces together, he drew breath sharply, staring at her as though seeing her for the first time.

"Of the... Eighth Division?" he asked faintly, and Shizuka's expression became shadowed. Slowly she nodded.

"I'm afraid so," she said penitently. "I know that can't be your favourite number right about now. I know what my Captain did, Koku... I'm sorry that he had to. I know you understand why he did, probably better than I do, but I know how I would have felt if that fight had gone the other way. Taichou is... very important in my life. Probably as important as Keitarou was in yours."

Ketsui sent her a sidelong glance at this point, and Kohaku interpreted the shifts in both shinigami's auras, as though there was an unspoken communication between the two of them that he was not party to. He let out his breath in a heavy sigh, suddenly understanding. He shook his head.

"I asked Kyouraku-dono to act, and he acted," he said wearily. "It doesn't mean I like what he had to do, but it's not him that really did it. I did. If I hadn't told him the things I'd seen, he wouldn't have known. I know whose fault it is my father is dead, Magaki-san. You don't need to apologise to me for anything. It's just, when your father is someone like mine, it's hard to know what the right thing is to do. And I think that, if I had a father like Kyouraku-dono, it would be much easier to believe in them and to grieve for them when they were gone."

Shock reflected in Shizuka's dark eyes for a brief instant, then she smiled wryly, shaking her head slowly.

"I guess it is true what they say about you, then," she mused. "You can see things other people can't."

"Sometimes," Kohaku responded cautiously. "Sometimes that just blinds me to what's really there, though. Seireitei is a foreign world to me in a lot of ways."

"That's only because you don't know enough people in it, yet, to call it home," Ketsui said frankly, getting to his feet and reaching down to haul the startled Kohaku to his. "Come on. Shizu, you too."

Taichou said not to leave the Second, but it's all right. If we walk to the far fence, you can see out over some of District Two, and then you can see, Kohaku, just what it is we put on the uniform to protect. And, of course, what you sacrificed everything to protect, too."

"To..protect?" Kohaku echoed, confused, but Ketsui did not give him an opportunity to refuse. Though the older man was not thickly built, and was less muscular than his brother, he had plenty of strength and the young stray saw nothing for it than to allow himself to be dragged across the compound to the white wooden fence that divided the court grounds from the world beyond. At the sight of it, he let out a gasp, for, stretching out for miles below them was a yawning valley, a sea of green interspersed with lines of blue. The Second Division's court was within Inner Seireitei, but although the barrier between the Shinigami's hallowed land and the Districts was clearly visible, it seemed like an innocuous line in the sand when compared to what lay beyond. Settlements clustered here and there, disappearing into near dots in the far distance, and Kohaku's breath caught in his throat as he surveyed it.

"That's District Two," at his other side, it was Shizuka who spoke. 'Ketsui and I both grew up in District Eight, which is awash with flowers at this time of year. All of the Eight Districts are distinct in some ways and the same in others. Because we grew up in places like that, we understand from the moment we step through the doors of the Academy what it is we want to protect. Ketsui's family is here, now,' she added, casting her friend a smile, "but in my case, my guardian and my brother are both living in District Eight still, and they could easily come into danger from Hollows at any time. My brother is married and when he writes to me, he often reminds me not to forget about them, since he has no way to defend himself against the monsters and he's worried for his children if they come near his home."

She tapped the hilt of her sword.

"That's why I trained to get this," she added. "Inner Seireitei feels like home to me. Taichou is here, and I wouldn't want to be anywhere else. But I have people to protect out there, too. And knowing that is what makes me a shinigami."

"My brother always said Seireitei was more beautiful than he could ever make me see," Kohaku breathed. "I thought Inner Seireitei was amazing, but to see so much green, for miles and miles and miles, and to know that's just one part of this world..." he trailed off, and Ketsui clapped a reassuring hand down on his shoulder.

“If you’re serious about staying with us and recruiting, one day, you’ll be out there protecting the people first hand,” he said wisely. “When that happens, you’ll see all those places for yourself. Mountains. Rivers. Beaches. Forests. As many landscapes as you can ever imagine. Maybe even the land your Father and mine once lived in, before things went so terribly wrong. Maybe even there.”

“Have you ever been?” Kohaku asked curiously, and Ketsui shook his head.

“My memories of Father aren’t as vivid as my brother’s, and I’m more tied to here than there. District Eight is my home, and my mother was buried there,” he said honestly. “Father’s grave might have troubled Ten-nii, but I’ve not really given it much thought. He died and he was buried and that’s all I know, really. But I have been a refugee, and I do understand hardship. I was born in District Seven, because that’s where Father was exiled to when he met mother. The current Endou are fine, but the previous ones ravaged their land and killed anyone who had spirit power. Mother, Ten-nii and I, we had to flee.”

“Mm,” Kohaku became grave, and he nodded. “Tenichi-dono told me about that,” he admitted, “and I know that’s how Father played to get his attention. He knew Tenichi-dono had been a refugee, had seen real hardship and experienced it. He knew Tenichi-dono would understand the plight of the people in Rukongai better than most. I don’t know what plans he might have had if Souja-dono hadn’t died and I hadn’t ended up here... but I’m glad he wasn’t able to realise them. Tenichi-dono isn’t a bad person, and I’m glad he’ll get a second chance.”

“Well, minimum five years labour isn’t exactly a picnic, not if it’s being run by the Onmitsukidou,” Shizuka mused, “but it’s better than the other options on offer, so I guess it will have to do.”

“Taichou said that, if he’s not sentenced to the deep cells, he can have visitors every so often, too,” Ketsui added. “That made Kirio-nee happy. She intends to go as often as she can.”

“And you don’t?” Shizuka asked quizzically, and Ketsui frowned, shrugging his shoulders.

“When I’ve settled my feelings, I will,” he said at length. “Right now, I’m still swirling around inside about what happened. Guilty. Angry. Frightened. Lots of things. I have to make peace with myself first, but then I will. Don’t worry, Shizu. I’m not going to abandon him. He’s my brother and I love him — I just have to put everything in perspective first.”

“We both have brothers who’ve done bad things,” Kohaku said wistfully. “At least Tenichi-dono’s actions can and will be forgiven. My brother is different. If he ever comes into range of the Gotei, he’ll be in big trouble. I know he’s not a bad person, but what he’s done can’t be taken back.”

“I guess you two have a lot in common, don’t you?” Shizuka realised, and Ketsui nodded.

“We do, which is why I’m going to make sure I help Kirio-nee make Kohaku feel at home in Thirteenth,” he said, casting the stray a grin. ‘Whether you like it or not, you’re stuck with me. And where I am, she’s usually somewhere behind,’ he jabbed his thumb in Shizuka’s direction, and she let out an exclamation of indignation at his casual aside, “so you’re probably stuck with her, too.”

“You’re so rude,” Shizuka poked out her tongue, twisting her features into a graphic grimace. “Besides, I’m here on my own account. Koku, Taichou wants to speak to you. I know he does, but right now, he can’t. What happened has upset him, and even though he isn’t really talking about it, I know. I know him better than most people. He’s spent a lot of time with Juushirou-dono, but I don’t know if even he can heal this wound. I think it has to heal on its own. You understand, I think, what he’s feeling right now. He wants to come, and he needs to... and when he does, I don’t want you to turn him away. So I’m... I’m the advance party. I don’t want you to be at odds with him over anything, or with me.”

Kohaku was silent for a moment, then he shook his head, turning to offer Shizuka a sad smile.

“I told you. I’m not cross, and I won’t turn him away, if and when he wants to speak to me,” he said softly. ‘This,’ he gestured out in front of him, “is why we both made the decisions we did and they were the right ones. And you don’t have to lay the groundwork. You don’t have to put yourself out on my account, Magaki-san. Really.”

“Well, say I want to, then,” Shizuka amended. “In that case, will you let me? I go to Thirteenth all the time, and Ketsui and I often train and spar together. I figure, if he’s helping you, I might be able to, too. And that would be fun. I don’t get to train with recruits, much. There are other, better officers, and even though Taichou can be soft on me, he doesn’t ever give me preference when it comes to things like that. I’m buried down under a mountain of Sora-dono’s imaginative chores right now, and I only got to come today because of Ketsui, but when that's finished, maybe... then I could come help, too?"

"Well, the Council want me to know all kinds of things before they accept me as a real shinigami," Kohaku gazed at his hands ruefully. "I think I'll need all the help I can get. I'm not used to people, Magaki-san, just like you said. But I'm in no position to refuse help from people who have been kind to me. If you want to come, I won't mind. Maybe I'll like it better that way. I've realised lately how much I'm starting to hate being alone."

"I don't think it's actually possible to be alone in Thirteenth Division, even if we do have the smallest squad," Ketsui considered. "Ah, but you'll see what I mean sooner rather than later. Taichou's on his way over, and so is Kirio-nee, so I guess we'll be on our way back to base soon. Edogawa-san said we weren't to over-tire you — you aren't over-tired, are you, Kohaku?"

"I'm fine," Kohaku assured him with a wry smile. "I promised Edogawa-san, too, and once I got out of that chamber, I felt much better. I won't faint or anything. Don't worry."

"Then I'd better scoot off back to Eighth and face Sora-dono's wrathful mop," Shizuka rolled her eyes. "I'll come by and see you soon, Koku-kun. I promise. And also, one more thing. Welcome to the Gotei. You're going to love it — trust me."

And with a wink she was gone, disappearing into a smooth shunpo that left Kohaku somewhat envious.

"Shizuka's the main reason I got through the Academy and graduated," Ketsui's voice broke through his reverie, and he felt his companion take him by the arm, steering him back towards where Juushirou and Kirio were approaching. "It's definitely not possible to be lonely if she's around, and that's a fact. Or depressed. She doesn't allow it."

"You've really known each other a long time, haven't you?" Kohaku asked quizzically, and Ketsui nodded.

"We have," he agreed, rubbing his chin. "And she does spend a lot of time at Thirteenth because of it. It's probably good you met her now, when it's just us, because half of both of our squads are convinced we're romantically involved, and I don't want you to get the wrong impression. We're not like that — but I do trust her one hundred percent, and if she says she'll come help, then she will. She keeps her word."

"Then I guess I'll see plenty of her, too," Kohaku murmured, his eyes drifting in the direction where tendrils of Shizuka's residual reiatsu were beginning to fragment on the breeze. "When I'm finally allowed to become a proper shinigami."

The walk from the Eleventh Division to the Fourth was not a long one as a normal rule, yet somehow that day, Atsushi did not feel inclined to hurry. As he made his way along the dusty thoroughfare, he paused to glance at the front entrances of his neighbours, absorbing the damage suffered by each one in the cold light of day. There were officers flurrying around the damaged fronts of Eighth and Ninth Division, and as he hesitated for a moment on the corner between the two barracks, Atsushi recognised the Sixth Division's Third Seated officer, waving his arms and giving instructions to an anxious, jittery group of junior officers. Though the blood and corpses had gone, there were dark shadows against the cobbles that Atsushi's battle experience told him were not simply shadows of clouds overhead, and his gaze darkened as he turned away.

He did not want to think about the death of Anabomi that morning. He had another item on his agenda, and it would not do to approach it with anything less than a settled mind.

"Good Morning, Atsushi-dono," As he reached the gate of the Fourth, he was greeted by Eriko, the healing squad's busy and efficient Vice Captain, who cast him a harried smile, inclining her head in acknowledgement. "Retsu-sama said that you would be coming at some point to speak to Sekime-taichou. I'm sorry, I can't take you there myself — I'm in the middle of seeing to a treatment for the Fifth Division's Vice Captain, but I trust you will be able to find your own way? Grab a recruit if you can't, but she's resting in the wing at the back, away from any of the serious cases."

"I'll find her," Atsushi said gruffly. "I'm not here to get in your way, Eriko-dono. I'm here to follow orders given me by the Council, and that's all."

"Well, I'm glad you are," Eriko admitted. "Sekime-taichou is not physically ill, Atsushi-dono. She was shaken and in shock when you brought her here, not to mention she had a bruise from where you brought her down — but there's nothing else really wrong. It's her emotional state that's the real concern. She won't leave her room, or see any of her Division as visitors, and has barely spoken to any of us. I hope that perhaps you can set her mind at some ease. She's not to blame for what happened to her, and in the circumstances, Twelfth Division need her back on duty."

“Michihashi’s been here, has he?” Atsushi asked sharply, and Eriko nodded.

“More than once, but she’s turned him away every time,” she agreed with a sigh. “Aoi-dono is concerned by it. He’s always had a close rapport with his Captain, and she’s never treated him like this before. He’s worried she’s blaming herself overly hard for what happened at the Twelfth.”

“I’ll settle that, don’t you worry,” Atsushi spoke grimly. “I’ll go see her now. You get back to your patient, Eriko-dono. Leave Sekime Mareiko to me.”

“Thank you,” despite the roughness of his words, Eriko offered him another smile, and Atsushi was sure there was relief in her eyes. “Retsu-sama said that, if anyone could bring her round, she felt sure that it would be you.”

And with this surprising and disconcerting statement she hurried off across the courtyard towards the set of chambers which housed the badly wounded Ryuusei and Hyakken.

Atsushi gritted his teeth, turning in the other direction and making his way purposefully towards where he could sense, oh so faintly, his old friend’s familiar reiatsu.

I don’t know what on earth would make Retsu-sama say something like that, but I don’t pretend to understand healers. More importantly is that I carry out my duty properly, no matter how unpleasant it might be. I brought this on myself, and on Mareiko, too. Well, we’re going to settle it... once and for all.

Mareiko was sitting up in bed as he reached her chamber, a robe draped across her shoulders, and her gaze, distant and unfocused, staring out of the window of the small chamber. She did not react at Atsushi’s approach and, as he stepped into the room proper, he felt certain that her mind was far from the present.

For a moment he eyed her, regret stirring in his heart, then, summoning his nerve, he spoke.

“Mareiko.”

It was just one word, spoken softly and without any of his usual military edge, but at the sound of it, Mareiko stirred, aware for the first time that she had company. At the sight of him her eyes widened, first with shock, then clear dismay, and instinctively she raised her left arm, as though intending to use Kidou to push him back the way he had come. Before she could release any spell, however, she appeared to remember where she was, and she sighed, tension seeping out of her as she sank back against her pillows. There were tears in the pale eyes, and she turned her head away, so that Atsushi could no longer see her face.

“There’s no reason for you to be here.”

“On the contrary, I have orders.”

Atsushi steeled his nerves, moving to the edge of the bed and standing a foot away from the edge, leaning up against the wall and folding his arms across his chest, more to hide his own discomfort than anything else. “The Council of Elders has commanded me to come and report to you in full the events of the Rukon. They said it should come from me, not any other.”

“So you want to make me relive it a second time?” Mareiko turned to face him now, her gaze so hopeless and melancholy that it almost broke Atsushi’s determination there and then. “Don’t lie to me, Atushikun. You’ve come to arrest me, haven’t you? My health is stable enough, now, to be interrogated... I have been waiting for someone to come.”

A sad smile touched her lips, but it did not reach her eyes.

“I suppose it is poetic justice, if that person is you,” she whispered. “Just don’t lie to me. Do what you need to do, but don’t try and make it easier... or harder... by pretending you’re here for some other reason.”

“I’m not lying to you,” Atsushi shook his head, meeting her gaze with a serious one of his own. “Why would I be arresting you, Mareiko?”

“You know why.”

“Because you threatened my life?” Atsushi demanded. “Don’t be foolish. We both know that, if I had chosen to fight you, I would’ve disarmed you. Whatever training you might have done with your left arm, you can’t truly use it without proper combat experience, against someone of rank. You and I, we were battle partners, once, and training equals — but things are different now.”

Mareiko flinched, as though pained by his words, and Atsushi hesitated, inwardly berating his bluntness. He shook his head.

“What I mean is that I chose not to fight you,” he said matter-of-factly. “And, as you see, I’m unhurt from the experience. You’re also unhurt. Your Division are worried, however — particularly by the fact you've refused to see Michihashi, or leave the confines of this room. The Council did indeed order me to come here — whether you like it or I want to do it, my duty is to do as they command."

"And the rest?" Mareiko's tones held a bitter edge. "Did you tell the Captains of the Council how I invaded your division, sedated your members and put a sword to your throat?"

"Of course," Atsushi looked surprised. "I made a full report to them, inclusive of that information. I felt it better... since I had done enough lying."

"Then you must know that they will arrest me," Mareiko whispered. "There's no other option for someone like me... who turns against her allies, fails in her duties to her squad and Clan Leader and acts contrary to Seireitei's interests."

"There will be no arrest warrant," Atsushi shook his head. "I told you, I made a full report. I told them that you launched yourself at me and attacked me, but that, following the hallucination we all saw, your attack abated. The Council have no intention of pressing charges against you. A similar incident occurred at Eighth, with the Tenth Division Captain Shiba Hakubei, and at Ninth, resulting in the death of Anabomi Seizuku. These men were clearly under the manipulative control of an invader. You are no different. Nobody will blame you for what happened."

"I am completely different," Mareiko's head had shot up at this. "Atsushi-kun, someone died? Anabomi-taichou... died?"

"He turned Hollow, and Endou-taichou dispatched him in the same way I was forced to dispatch Sakanoue, twenty five years ago," Atsushi's voice tightened slightly at this, though somehow he kept his words casual. "He had ingested poison of some kind, left, it is believed, by the same man who mutated Heiji and who would have killed all of us, in Rukongai, had he had the chance."

"No..." Mareiko's skin was ash pale, and she shook her head. "No, but then... but you don't... you don't unders... I wasn't... it wasn't like that. I didn't know... Anabomi-taichou... anyone..."

She buried her head in her hands.

"No, I knew," she admitted, her words tinged with grief. "I knew, but I didn't understand. I didn't care. I could only think of... of..."

"Of killing me?" Atsushi moved to sit on the end of the bed, and at his closeness, Mareiko flinched back, staring at him warily. "Yes, I know you weren't under Keitarou's control. Like it or not, Mareiko, I know you. Or maybe, I knew you, as more than just the distracted scientist people see you as today. I know there was real emotion and intent in your movements and your actions. You intended to kill me, and you used the chaos going on around you to do it. I understood that when you attacked me. I understood that you knew... and that this was what you wanted to do.”

“Then why do the Council...”

“Because I told them so,” Atsushi said matter-of-factly.

“Why?” Mareiko’s eyes almost fell out of her head, and Atsushi snorted.

“Fool,” he said disparagingly. “The attack on me was entirely my own fault. I concealed important evidence. True, I hoped it would be easier on you and everyone if I did... and it hasn’t been easy on me, carrying that burden all these years without facing a tribunal and receiving whatever judgement due me. But when I saw your face, I knew you’d known the whole time. I’d created that suffering inside of you... and so I deserved your hate. You were not wrong to try and kill me. If I had been you, believing what you believed in, I would’ve acted the same.”

“Atsushi-kun...” Now Mareiko’s tears fell, and she shook her head. “But I can’t... it can’t... it’s not true. Atsushi-kun, I didn’t just take advantage. I drugged my division, instead of letting them go on duty, so that Third Division remained unprotected. I gave Taichou’s information to his enemy... our enemy... to that man, all because I’d given up on justice and I wanted... I wanted to settle the score. I felt my life was over, except for this one thing... avenging my Captain, no matter what it took. And then, in that image... but it doesn’t change anything. You can’t lie and tell them I did it because Keitarou made me. I didn’t. I helped Keitarou... in order to give me a chance to kill you when everyone’s guard was down.”

Atsushi gazed at her for a moment, digesting this. Then, at length he said,

“It’s too late. I already have.”

“Then I’ll just have to tell them...”

Before Mareiko could finish her sentence, Atsushi had pressed his fingers to her lips, shaking his head.

“It’s over, so let it stay over,” he said softly.

“Atsushi-kun!” Mareiko thrust his arm away, staring at him in confusion. “I just told you I was a spy for the enemy! I leaked information on shinigami movements, I abandoned my duty to protect Third Division...”

“As I understand it, the fact you did worked in our favour,” Atsushi reflected. “I don’t fully understand the hallucination we both saw, nor did the Council seem inclined to give me a lot of additional information to explain it — but one thing it did do was break Keitarou’s hold over all those he had been controlling in Seireitei. It also blew up Third Division’s Senkaimon, preventing the Council Captains from returning prematurely and falling additionally under Keitarou’s spell. From what we can gather, he intended to control Captains and make them kill other Captains — wiping out the whole of the Gotei from start to finish.”

Mareiko chewed on her lip, shaking her head.

“I never asked him how he intended to achieve the changes he wanted to achieve,” she whispered. “I never did anything... here... on his behalf, never killed anyone, never arranged for anyone to die. But by helping him, I know I’m still guilty. It doesn’t matter if he didn’t tell me things. I suppose, subconsciously, I understood that he was going to kill people. Maybe I even wanted it, for a while. Perhaps I didn’t think it mattered... I don’t even know. I just wanted... I just...”

“Kusakawa didn’t deserve you to care about him as much as that,” Atsushi said gravely. “Because of that man, people are dead. Anabomi may be among them. We don’t know yet, but I wouldn’t be at all surprised if the scientific evidence proves that potion he drank to be connected in some way. Because of that man, you lost the use of your right arm in combat, and I lost my Vice Captain. He was never worthy of your loyalty, Mareiko. I just wish you didn’t have to know of it... and the fact that you do, I take as my failing. Everything that happened since is my responsibility and my fault... whatever you said, whatever you did to help Keitarou, it was all with the aim of avenging yourself on me. If I had been honest, you would never have followed that path. If I had submitted myself and my evidence when we returned from Rukongai, and allowed the truth to come out then... maybe it would’ve been better. I thought I was the only one who had to live with it, and I knew that I could, so long as I had a duty to do and I was of use to the Gotei as a whole. Your seeing anything of the fight between us was an oversight on my part. I didn’t know... and so I misjudged. Because of that...”

“You didn’t do anything wrong,” Mareiko reached up to wipe away her tears. “If you had told the truth, whatever you had said, I wouldn’t have believed it. But... seeing those images... I knew they were true. You don't have to report to me, Atsushi-kun, I know. Every thought, every word... was real. And I didn't see you kill my Captain. Not exactly. I sensed you fighting, and struggled to the scene... I saw you crossing blades, and releasing your swords. I must have then lost consciousness, because the next thing I saw was you bent over his body, and there was so much blood. Maybe if I'd seen everything, I'd have understood... but I didn't. I remember staggering away... I don't even know how far I walked before I collapsed, or where I went to. I don't know where they found me... I just had to get away, far away from you. My memories are blurry, but the bits I have tally with that dream-like vision that invaded our minds and shook me back to sanity. My knowledge was flawed and incomplete — my behaviour isn't justifiable. I am guilty of treason and ought to be tried for it. Nothing else will suffice.”

“And then, what will Twelfth do?” Atsushi demanded, a sharp edge to his tones, and Mareiko stared at him in dismay. “They’re already reeling with the knowledge that their first and former Captain was a traitor to his Clan and his Division, and responsible for the deaths of everyone who ever succumbed to Hollow-creatures in Rukongai. They already have that to deal with — and now you want to take their second Captain from them in the same shameful way?”

“But I...”

“Your responsibility is to those men and women who serve under you, Sekime Mareiko,” Atsushi snapped, grabbing her by the shoulders and giving her a little shake. “The fighter I used to train with and the friend I used to have was always positive, always believing, always dedicated to every part of the job at hand. Who was it who would drive me crazy, stopping to talk to every insignificant Plus soul you saw who was frightened? How many times did you scold me or my impatience? You’d waste time making stones spark and glitter for the orphaned children who used to stray near our campfires late at night, but even when they were in our way, you wouldn’t let me evict them and you were the only one who could bend my will that way. Your squad are like those children now, Mareiko. While some of them are obviously complete idiots, even the competent ones are lost without their leader to take command. They are loyal to you, and they miss you. Most of them aren’t Kusakawa’s men, and have come into Twelfth since you took the haori. Even if you feel you didn’t want or deserve to be a Captain, they’ve never known anything else. The entire hierarchy is built around your leadership and their belief in you. Michihashi is a sensible, clever adjutant, miles from the clod I have at my beck and call, and, despite the frequent explosions, he has complete faith in you as his superior officer. I heard he testified on your behalf, telling the Council your behaviour that day was unlike you and as though you had been possessed. He had no doubts that you were acting under Keitarou's control — when I found him wandering drunkenly outside the Twelfth that day, it was the first thing he wanted to impress on me. I wasn't the only one giving them that impression — your Vice Captain has stuck by your side as well, and he's a good man. Right now, your emotions are raw, because you have learned what it is like to be betrayed by your Captain. Are you going to give Michihashi those same emotions, and impose more grief upon your squad?"

Mareiko's jaw could not drop any further, and Atsushi relinquished his grip on her shoulders, moving towards the window and glancing outside at the Fourth Division grounds.

"My punishment, on coming back to Seireitei twenty-five years ago, was to serve as a Captain of the Gotei," he said softly. "I don't make friends among my peers as a rule, nor do I socialise with them more than is necessary. As a man, I cared little for Kusakawa's death... his crimes were not forgivable, and he had no remorse for what he had done. He deserved his fate. But in that incident, because of what happened, I lost two people who I considered valuable beyond the limits of my duty. I lost Heiji, who was always like a son to me. And I lost my best friend."

He turned to glance at her, a faintly sheepish expression touching his severe features.

"I broke the ties between us because I felt it was better that way. I couldn't continue how we had before, knowing that I had taken your Captain's life," he added. "Because I did, I never realised how much you knew, and that is also my failing. I'm resigned to your hatred of me, Mareiko. I can live with it, as I've lived with everything else. It doesn't change my duty to my Division, though. I work with a Vice Captain I despise, and I do the things expected of me. So I'll act until I die, or am no longer fit for active service. It's not for me to decide I am useless to the Gotei. It's for the Gotei to rid themselves of me."

"Even if you say that, you didn't act as a traitor," Mareiko's tears continued to fall. "What I did... however you put it, it doesn't change it. The Gotei would not want someone like me to serve as a Captain, if they understood."

"But it is over, now," Atsushi said matter-of-factly. "The Council have no intention of removing your haori. I will tell you now that if you go to the Council and tell them any of this, run away from your duties and your squad and betray the Gotei all over again, I will not forgive you. More, I will not allow it to go any further. If you go to the Council and claim to have been working with Keitarou, I will simply go there and claim that it was my actions, not yours, and you are trying to protect me. I will tell them that you came to kill me because you had discovered I was spying, and that I said Keitarou was controlling you to cover my back.”

“But... I...” Horror flooded Mareiko’s features, and Atsushi nodded.

“Your Captain’s life, Heiji’s life, they are on my conscience,” he said bluntly. “My life isn’t precious enough to me to see another person’s sacrificed because of things I’ve done. You know I wouldn’t say such a thing unless I meant it. The choice is yours. You can put this behind you, go back to your squad and to Nagesu-sama and do your penance on duty, killing Hollows and helping put things to rights, or you can see me executed for your sins, and live with the aftermath. Nobody will ever believe you a traitor... especially not considering your faulty sword arm and frequent fits of public absentmindedness. As for me, I’ve already lied, and concealed two deaths. They know we used to be friends, and that you have a reputation for kindness that I’ve never had. Of course you would try to shield me... it would be an easy choice for them to make.”

Mareiko gazed at him for a moment, then she sighed, a faint, resigned smile touching her lips. There was a glitter of relief in her gaze, and Atsushi absorbed this with a lighter heart. Slowly she held up her hands in indication of defeat.

“You are as mean and ruthless now as you ever were when we hunted Hollows together,” she murmured. “And, like always, you know me better than I even know myself. I thought I hated you. I thought I wanted you dead... but the thought of letting you die for my crimes gives me no joy or pleasure. I realised that the person I thought I hated is like the person I thought I respected above all others. They’re myths created by my misconceptions. I just... wanted to believe in my Captain. I never suspected him of anything... even now, I find it hard.”

“I wish that I had been quicker to the draw,” Atsushi admitted. “I might have saved Sakanoue’s life, and that does haunt me. I am sorry, too, that you had to live so long not understanding all the facts. I thought it was for the best, and it was a mistake of judgement. I wanted to protect you, but I forgot that you were a shinigami, not a damsel in distress. I let my personal views overtake my duty in a lot of ways. Well, I suppose you know that, now. You’ve seen it all for yourself. Everything, good and bad.”

Mareiko was silent for a moment, toying with her bedcovers.

“Taichou said things, about me... and you,” she murmured, and a stricken expression entered Atsushi’s gaze. “It’s all right, I won’t... I’m not going to bring them up, or discuss them in any detail. I’m not going to ask you any questions, Atsushi-kun. Just that I think... when he said it, and I saw your face, I knew. I knew that what I was seeing was true, and that I’d had it all wrong. You were my friend, even when I doubted you. You still are my friend, now. I don’t hate you. I don’t expect you to forgive me, and I can’t say yet that I’m glad you acted how you did. But I will... try to work out what really happened and accept it in my own mind.”

She sighed, gazing at her chipped nails.

“The truth is, I would’ve done anything for that man. Even died for him,” she murmured. “I owed him everything, and when you owe someone that, it’s hard to see them objectively. It’s far more complicated than maybe even you realise it is. Kusakawa-taichou wasn’t just the Captain who promoted me. He... and his father... were far bigger in my life.”

“Meaning?” Atsushi eyed her quizzically, and Mareiko shrugged, letting out another heavy sigh. There was a long pause, then,

“I am an Urahara,” she said cautiously, “but then in some circles, I’m not.”

“I beg your pardon?” Now Atsushi was befuddled, and despite herself, Mareiko managed a feeble smile.

“My family are Fourth Degree Urahara, like yours are Fourth Degree Yamamoto,” she said frankly. “At least, the Sekime family are Fourth Degree Urahara. Technically I am... outside the degrees of Clan. Well, officially. So I have always been told.”

“I don’t understand what you’re getting at,” Atsushi admitted. “You just said that the Sekime family are Fourth Degree.”

“Yes, but I was adopted by them when I was four years old,” Mareiko responded earnestly. “My mother was a Fifth Degree Urahara, or in other words, outside of the Clan circle. I was also born illegitimate. Nobody knows who my father was. People speculated that it was someone from higher up within the Clan, and I have such Urahara features most people think it’s true — but there was never any firm proof. My mother would never tell anyone. She had no significant connections of her own, though, at the time I was born.

She didn't even have money to fall back on — her family cut her off because of me, and so she had to resort to other ways to feed us. She was arrested for stealing... and sent to prison."

Atsushi's eyes narrowed at this, but he did not comment, and encouraged, Mareiko continued.

"Daigo-sama was in charge of the prisons, then," she reflected. "Daigo-sama, Taichou's father. Mother was supposed to be put to death, but because of me, he arranged for her to be pardoned. I don't remember enough details of what happened next — but I left her custody the same day. Daigo-sama told me that Mother had asked him to help me, because she couldn't give me a proper life. Apparently he saw potential in me, and promised to do what he could. As a result, I was adopted by the Sekime family. The Sekime are quite peripheral to the Clan, and rarely become directly involved in politics. My adoptive father worked with Daigo-sama, which is how the whole business came about. He and my adoptive mother never had their own children. My mother miscarried four or five times, until a healer told her she wouldn't ever bear her own children. Because I was so visibly Urahara in my appearance, they felt that I would be a suitable substitute, and when it turned out that I had good spirit power, they decided to get me trained. Daigo-sama helped here, as well... and after he died, Shougo-dono continued to ensure that I completed my education, both as a scientist and as a shinigami."

She raised her gaze, meeting Atsushi's shocked one with an even one of her own.

"By birth, I am District, and illegitimate," she said simply. "I'm not kin to the Urahara, not formally, because Mother and I are both outside the degrees of Clan. If my father knew he had spawned me, he never came forward to claim me — so he's not family to me, either. I can't assume he was important or not important. To me he's not important, because he abandoned Mother and I... it makes him a deadbeat, no matter his bloodline."

She shrugged.

"For that reason, I can never ignore the plight of the people on the other side of the Clan divide," she owned. "I don't know what ultimately happened to my mother. I never saw her or heard from her again. Daigo-sama promised he'd take care of her, but she never wrote to me after I was adopted, so I think maybe she died. There was a lot of disease in District Three then, and I don't think she wanted to accept handouts from the Clan she'd given her daughter up to. I love my adoptive parents dearly, but I can't ever be their blood daughter.

When Shougo-sama... Taichou... when he was called upon to begin Twelfth Division, he selected me out of everyone to be his Vice Captain. It raised a lot of eyebrows, because there were rumours, and people started saying I was Daigo-sama's illegitimate daughter, which made me upset and ashamed. Taichou ignored it, though. He said that he wanted the best Vice Captain that the Urahara could provide, and that was me. He brought me here, gave me a purpose and a place and allowed me to continue my own work whilst helping run the Twelfth. He and his father built my whole world for me. When he died, I... I didn't know what to do any more. I had seen the person I believed in most in the world cut down by someone I thought was my friend."

She folded her hands absently in her lap.

"I promised my adoptive parents I wouldn't ever talk about this with anyone in the Gotei, because they felt I belonged to them. I wanted to preserve that, and I haven't," she added. "I don't know if Nagesu-sama knows all the details — or maybe he knows more than I do. I said before that I don't know who my blood father was, but I am quite sure it wasn't Daigo-sama, since Mother didn't know him when she was arrested. It's possible Nagesu-sama does know, but I've never asked him, and he's always treated me as a valid member of his Clan. I'm only telling you, now, because I wanted you to understand — not only how important Taichou was to me, but also... that if the things Taichou said to you were ever true, even if they are no longer... you ought to know who and what I really am. Taichou said we were a good match, but really, he was insulting you. He was comparing your good bloodline to my broken one, and..."

"Stop it," Atsushi could bear it no longer, and it was all he could do not to slap his companion, instead clamping his hand roughly around her jaw. "Stop it! You don't need to say anything to me. I didn't ask for an explanation, and you didn't need to break your promise to someone else to give one. What I think of the Districts is irrelevant, and largely coloured by that interfering busybody from the Thirteenth and the family club he calls his Division. I'm gratified to know that Kusakawa and his father did something commendable in their lives, but otherwise..."

He paused, then shrugged.

"Things are not as either of us thought or expected," he said simply. "The things you just told me are no business of mine, but nor do I find them troubling. Your affection for your Captain was what it was. Your background is what it is. I became friends with Sekime Mareiko. I believe that to be the person sitting in front of me now. That's all that's important. Your parents are right. You are their child, now."

"True," Mareiko pushed his hand away a second time, "but that doesn't make me Clan."

"Perhaps not," Atsushi admitted reluctantly, "but I've been told the world is changing. Perhaps those stories are right, and maybe it is. I don't know. Keitarou was a pure-blooded Clansman, and so was Kusakawa. Yet both of them destroyed innocent lives and threatened the stability of our whole world for their own gain. I'm not sure how much I believe in anything any more, to be honest. Perhaps I have things to consider as well."

He cast her a sidelong glance.

"My opinion of you has never changed, even if my treatment of you has," he said frankly. "I don't intend on discussing it any further, but what you just told me alters nothing. Of course, if you were now to abandon your squad and your duties and run away from the people who need you, that might be a different matter. Maybe then I could say you were, truly, lacking in Clan integrity. So long as you intend to take up your duties again, however, I look forward to working with you once more."

"I will do as you say," Mareiko looked thoughtful. "You don't need to protect me any more. You're right — living with guilt for something is harder than facing justice. I didn't think of it before, but looking back, I can see it in myself. I changed — this changed me, and I think it will keep doing so. I'm not angry, yet. I was angry with you, but for Taichou I can only feel grief and frustration."

She flexed her left arm pensively.

"Maybe, when that anger comes, you'll help me learn to fight with it," she murmured. "I'm pretty sure that I'm more capable than you think of fighting left-handed — but I'm sure your sword could help me polish any rough edges in my style. If I'm going to stay Captain of Twelfth, well then I'm going to be a worthwhile one. I'm going to be useful to the Gotei until I die, just like you — as penance for the sins I've committed, just like you."

"Then there's no more to say on the matter," Atsushi offered her a smile, extending his hand to hers, and slowly Mareiko took it, shaking it firmly. "Shall I tell Michihashi that you feel well enough to see him?"

"If you don't mind," Mareiko nodded. "Nagesu-sama, also. Maybe there's something I can do, scientifically, to help with all of this. Who knows? Perhaps I'll find my closure, if I see for myself all the evidence and how it slots together."

"You know, that young lad is really quite astonishing."

Mitsuki set a mug of green tea down on the low slung table, casting the room's other occupant a grin as she took her own seat against some cushions by the window, taking a sip. It was the evening after Tenichi's trial and, as the sun had begun to sink over Seireitei's horizon, the healer and the Captain had taken refuge from the chaos of changing Division patrols for a moment of peace within Ugendou. As time had passed, the world outside had grown more peaceful, and so Mitsuki had elected to go make tea, stating that it was deserved by both of them

"He's taken no permanent harm from this morning's endeavours," she continued now. "He's just a little tired, but stronger than I thought he might be after exerting himself in that way. All the symptoms I noticed getting worse in him have begun to improve since he summoned Kyouka Raigen — and his appetite has improved so much lately that I'm not too worried about him, now. He's turned a mental corner and it's improving his physical state... but I admit, he's surprised me."

"I think that he's realised the same thing that I did, after I lost Father," Juushirou mused pensively, scooping up the mug of tea and taking a sip. "Thank you, Mitsuki. I needed this, after such a busy day. I'm apt to be too protective of the lad, which Shunsui has called me out on — but I did think the trial today might be oppressive for him. Midori-sama is an imposing individual, but all went fairly smoothly, thank goodness. I begin to think — tentatively — that we're over the worst of the fallout where the invasion was concerned. Not that I think Koku's forgotten his grief or how he really feels about Keitarou's death, but, like me, he's realised how the only thing he can do now is live."

"Well, that suits me too. I like seeing my patients recover, though I'm not sure I had anything to do with the recovery," Mitsuki set her mug down on the sill beside her with a sigh. "I've gotten fond of the brat, but I don't pretend I understand his spirit power as much as I'd like. Are you going to be able to take that on? Kyouka Raigen is unusual beyond unusual."

"I've already written to Sensei, and he's going to come speak to Koku personally about it," Juushirou responded. "It's the only answer I have, so I'm relieved. Kyouka Raigen is outside of my comfort zone — and it's already acted in a hostile way towards Koku. I don't want it to do so again, so that's my pre-emptive strike. Sensei said that, when the recess comes at the Academy, he'll travel into Inner Seireitei and see the boy personally. So some of my worries are allayed by that. I intend to do what I can for the lad, and this way, I think I can."

"I'm sure you can," Mitsuki admitted, "but you also need to pay attention to your own health. You ought to take some time off now that everything is moving more smoothly. Tenichi-dono's trial is over and his sentence is a light one, considering. Kohaku is acclimatising to life in Seireitei, and Keitarou is gone. Surely that means you can take a moment's breather? Take off your haori and just relax for once?"

"Technically I'm never fully off duty, but you're right, I don't have anything pressing," Juushirou mused, taking another sip of his drink. "It seems a little surreal, because everything's been so hectic. Even Shunsui's visits with sake have been political lately — which as you can imagine, is a poor mix at the best of times."

"Is Kyouraku-kun all right?" Mitsuki's gaze softened, and Juushirou sighed.

"I hope so," he admitted. "He says he will be. I'd rather he was up front about how he's feeling than pretending he's fine and nothing is bothering him, so I guess that will have to do. What he did was right and he knows that. Just accepting the reality of it is different. He's far more sensitive to things like that than he lets on... but he's older now than he was when we fought in Seventh District. I think he'll come through it — and while he is, I'll be here if he needs me. Even if I didn't fight the fight, I know we were in this together, so it's only right that I do."

"Mm," Mitsuki pressed her lips together thoughtfully, and Juushirou arched an eyebrow.

"What?"

"When you say things like that, I realise you haven't changed very much since we were students, and it comforts me," Mitsuki admitted. "You've grown up, too. You've your Division and you're a Captain and you have the haori and all those things, but you're still Juushirou in so many other ways. And something else, too. I can go away for millennia if I like, but it won't matter. When I come back, and see you, I'm going to still be in love with you. I'm resigning myself to it... you're Juushirou, haori or not, and there's no point me pretending otherwise."

"We really haven't had a chance to talk about anything like that since you came back,” Juushirou’s cheeks reddened slightly at her forthrightness, but he nodded, sitting back against the wall of the chamber pensively. “I know what you mean, though. Shunsui teased me — he says I’m like Koku’s father, and since you’ve been playing mother hen, we ought to stop beating around the bush. I know he’s using distraction tactics because of his own feelings right now, but he isn’t wrong. I mean, we tried to not define ourselves all those years ago, because we each had our paths to follow — but honestly, did we even bother to listen to ourselves?”

“You mean, being just friends?” Mitsuki pursed her lips. “I don’t think we ever fooled anyone with that claim, did we? Maybe not even ourselves, not deep down. We settled for it because at the time, we both needed it. I needed to go to Rukongai. You needed to join the Gotei. Now, though, where does it leave us? You’re a Captain with a squad to flock around you. Retsu-sama has said she’ll rank me at the end of the month, but there’s still a likelihood I’ll be sent to Rukongai again, and I’m rather hoping for it now I’ve heard from Koku directly the situation some of the people there are dealing with. Hopefully I won’t be there as long this time, and it won’t prove so dangerous — but there’s a good likelihood that we’ll be apart again sooner rather than later. In the meantime, we’re flapping around pretending we’re just old school pals... and I don’t know that we’re doing anything but wasting time.”

“Going back to Rukongai?” Juushirou’s expression went through several different emotions, then he sighed, holding up his hands. “I know. It’s your job, just like this is mine, and I won’t try to stop you. It’ll be hard, though. I feel I just got you back. I hadn’t realised how much I was missing you until I thought you were dead, and now you’re here... well, is it wrong for me not to want to let you out of my sight again?”

“No, I rather like that you feel that way,” Mitsuki dimpled, her cheeks pinkening at his words. “Only we both know that my decision where Katsura was concerned shows how little I really understand about Inner Seireitei. It could’ve ended a lot worse, and Katsura’s future intentions are still unknown. I hope for the best, but I might have opened a whole future can of worms yet — it’s too soon to know. I don’t believe he’ll attack his brother, but I can’t read his mind. He, on the other hand, may well have read mine, and I can’t be certain of his motives.”

“I want to believe in him because Koku does,” Juushirou reflected. “We’ll cross that hurdle when we reach it. Right now, he’s gone, and that’s all that matters.”

“I still understand Rukongai better, though,” Mitsuki admitted. “I’m as far from a Clan hime now as you can get, Juushirou. I realised it when I went back to Sixth for that brief spell. I love Ryu and Shirogane-senpai dearly, and my father more than anything. I don’t belong in that world now, though. I’ve roughed it in Rukongai for too long to even pretend that I still have the slightest inkling of Clan inside of me. My bloodline is what it is, but in Inner Seireitei, I almost feel it’s irrelevant. I’m just another healer, here. Most people don’t know who I am. Everyone knows you, though. Our positions are reversed... you’re now the important person consorting with an unranked officer of a foreign Division, did you realise that?”

“Like I’d ever bothered to stop and think it out,” Juushirou scolded, shaking his head. He drained the last of his tea from his mug, setting it aside. “You’re Mitsuki, and that’s all. There have always been lots of barriers in our way, and some of those still exist... but it doesn’t stop you from being Mitsuki.”

He reddened again, then,

“I like to think of you as ‘my’ Mitsuki, even if it’s not true,” he confessed. “Clan or District, it’s always been that way for me and I don’t suppose a little bit of internal warfare and strife is going to change that.”

“I’m quite glad to hear it,” Mitsuki assured him. “In which case, I want to stop beating around the bush. Being apart, then almost losing my life, I realised that I didn’t want to die with us leaving things so open. It felt unfair, somehow, that I could’ve been ripped away permanently, and I didn’t want to break my promise and not come back. It heightens your priorities — and you’re one of those to me. Do you still feel the same as you did before, about my Clan background and your position? Because, if you asked me to marry you here and now...”

“Don’t,” Juushirou was at her side in an instant, a pale finger pressed against her lips as he shook his head. “Marriage is out of the question. Now, maybe always. Our lives have separate callings and it would become complicated along the line. I don’t want you to give up your position for my sake, Mitsuki, but I can’t give up mine for yours. You understand, I think, how important Thirteenth’s existence is, and now Koku is here, that just intensified. I have too many people relying on me — and you have too many people needing you for us to be that selfish.”

“Sometimes it’s hard not to be selfish,” Mitsuki sighed, pushing his hand aside. “I understand your rationale, but I don’t like it. In the time we spend together, everything else comes between us and keeps us apart. We might only get to spend fleeting moments together in the future, too — I don't know, yet, where my Captain will send me."

"But you know you would go if she called, and that would be harder, in current society, if you were my wife," Juushirou pointed out softly. "I'm not a Clansman. I don't have a manor or an estate or anything to offer in that regard, nor, really, a home away from Seireitei. You couldn't come here, because if you did, it would make everything you believe in doing impossible. Much as I love you... no, because I love you, I know that you'd never be happy that way. It's not feasible. It can't happen. Not right now, and maybe not ever."

Mitsuki was silent for a moment, gazing at her hands. Then she raised her gaze, and Juushirou let out a gasp at the glitter of tears on her lashes. Slowly she shook her head.

"I'm not going to let smart rhetoric push me away again," she murmured, and there was a catch in her voice. "I understand what you're saying, and it's not wrong. We can't get married. You're right, we can't. But I'm not willing to let go again. I won't walk away and pretend we can carry on being just friends, when we've both admitted that we can't. Somewhere, we have to be a little selfish, Juushirou. If not, then both of us will be just as unhappy as you say I'd be if something forced me to give up my vocation — or you, yours. If we can't marry, then we can't... but I've moved beyond the realms of 'just friends'. I was hoping that you had, too... with everything we've been through."

Juushirou's eyes softened, and gently, he cupped her chin in his hands, tilting her face so that her grey eyes met his hazel ones directly.

"I never thought you'd come at me with that line of attack," he acknowledged. "I suppose one thing has changed, hasn't it? We both realise that the future isn't infinite. When I was younger, I knew my illness might kill me, but since it stabilised, I've become complacent and maybe, so were you. We assumed we'd meet again, but we didn't factor in the realities of doing our job. We both work in a dangerous field and our lives might be threatened again tomorrow, for all we know."

"They might," Mitsuki agreed softly. "So I want us to live more in the moment, Juushirou. Take advantage of the time we have, even if it's brief. If I go to Rukongai, I want to go knowing that there's nothing left unsaid between us. I'm not going to fall in love with anyone else, or be anybody's prize hime. That's not my life, and we both know it all too well, now. I'm only ever going to let you this far into my heart, so even if we can't get married, I'm not just going to give up."

"Well, maybe we can negotiate a settlement," Juushirou's eyes became teasing despite himself, and Mitsuki pulled a face, her own gaze glittering with sudden affection. "I understand your terms, Edogawa-san. I shall take them on board for further careful review."

"Well, don't review them too carefully for too long, or I might have vanished again," Mitsuki warned him, and Juushirou shook his head.

"I'm definitely not letting that happen," he said firmly. "Not while I have you right in front of me like this."

"Then what do you intend to do about it, Ukitake-taichou?" Mitsuki demanded, and Juushirou offered her a faint, embarrassed smile, lifting his fingers to tuck a stray wisp of her dark hair behind her ear.

"I have one idea," he murmured, and then, before she could react, he kissed her.

77. Changing Seireitei

Chapter Seventy Five : Changing Seireitei

Dawn.

Mitsuki stood at the window, gazing out pensively over the glittering surface of the koi pond. The rays of light glinted off the fins of the fish as they splashed and dove deep beneath the ripples, and a faint smile touched her lips. Summer was in full bloom, now. It would be another warm, cloudless day, like those which had preceded it... and yet this was the first time she had ever seen the dawn from here.

She pulled the tie of her robe more tightly around her waist, turning back into the chamber. The room's only other occupant was still fast asleep, and her eyes softened as she watched him, his breathing deep and even. He had been under so much strain, she reflected, and yet, at last, some of that tension was starting to leave his thin frame. She did not have the heart to wake him, although she knew that, soon, Thirteenth Division would be a hive of activity, and Enishi's thudding steps and booming voice would make it hard for anyone to stay deep in slumber.

Carefully she knelt at Juushirou's side, reaching to adjust the soft white fabric of the haori that lay draped over his body. He did not stir, but his lips parted and an indistinct murmur dropped from them, making her pause, then smile once more. Though it had not been coherent, she had known it was her name. Even in his sleep, then, he had not forgotten her.

I was stupid to think he ever would, even if there are more people depending on him now than there ever were before.

Gently she pushed the stray wisps of hair back from his face, then sat back on her heels, hugging her arms around her body.

You protected me, you protected Koku, you kept your word to Souja and your former recruit isn't beyond salvation. Being a Captain is a heavier job than I could ever have imagined — but you still found time for me and I know you always would.

She got to her feet, letting out a little sigh of regret that she would not see him wake.

I should go. I need to get back to my own quarters and dress, before someone sees me here. It would be hard to explain, and I'm not good at telling lies. Juushirou and I might have decided to stop being ambiguous about our friendship — and a lot has changed since we were students. It doesn't mean that I want it to be gossip around the Division, though. It's not their business — it's not anyone's business.

I don't know why we didn't realise that before — it's nobody's business but ours. I don't care if I'm Clan, or he's not, or anything else. I could've died before I saw him again. We might all have died. Regretting that would've been far more painful than regretting a moment of rebellion... and who knows? Maybe the world really is changing.

She cast Juushirou one last glance, resting her hand on the door of Ugendou with a measure of reluctance.

I'm not a Clan hime now, I'm a Fourth Division shinigami, and one who might soon hold Division rank. I may go back to Rukongai, I may not. I don't know, yet, but I meant it when I told Juushirou that my home is no longer Sixth District. My father and my family are still people I love, but my life has changed and, after meeting Katsura and his brother, I know I don't want it to change back. We have things to do, here. Juushirou and I both. Separately, and, maybe one day, together, when we finally bring down the barrier between Clan and District, and open up the barricades between Seireitei and Rukongai for good.

Softly she pushed open the door of the small wooden annexe, being careful not to make any additional sound as she slipped out onto the walkway, closing the door behind her with just as much meticulous care.

Sweet dreams, Juushirou-kun. People were wrong when they considered you beneath me. The truth is that it's always been the other way around... and I'm just glad you haven't figured that out yet. If you ever got tired of me, I don't know what I'd do... coming back here, to you..is what really saved me from myself this time.

“Mitsuki?!”

The sound of Naoko's voice made her jump, and she swung around guiltily, cheeks flooding scarlet as she met the incredulous green gaze of the Division's Third Seated officer. For a moment there was silence, then Mitsuki let out her breath in a rush, darting forward and grabbing her friend by the hand, dragging her back along the wooden walkway towards the main heart of the Division's barracks.

“Hey, what are you... I was going to...”

“Juushirou is sleeping, and I want him to stay that way,” Mitsuki said firmly, not making any attempt to either slow down or release her grip until they were safely out of earshot. “He's had a lot to do, lately, and he needs his rest, too.”

“Fine, but there’s no reason to yank my arm out of its socket and drag me halfway across the world to tell me that!” Naoko wrenched her hand free, casting her friend a glare. “And don’t try and fool me by pretending you were there in a healing capacity. I’m pretty familiar with the Unohana — and I never saw any of them come and do house-calls in their nightwear.”

She paused, appraising her friend briskly, and her eyes narrowed.

“My mistake. It appears to be the Captain’s nightwear.”

“Shh!”

It was impossible for Mitsuki to go any redder now, but she flapped her hands furiously, glaring at Naoko in embarrassed indignation. “I don’t want to create a scene! This is exactly the kind of thing I was trying to avoid by slipping out so early — why are you here right now, anyway? You can’t be going to see Juushirou this early, surely?”

“Don’t turn your guilty conscience around on me. I live here, remember? I can walk where I choose, when I choose,” Naoko scolded, though obediently she lowered her voice, “and you needn’t worry, I’m not a gossip — though it’s lucky for you that it was me who stumbled on you and not someone else. I won’t tell anyone, but seriously, Mi-chan, don’t you think that you’re dancing a little close to the flame? What happened to all the hang-ups about Clan and District? Not to mention that Seireitei is still picking up pieces... and yet you’re calling on my Captain in the middle of the night?”

“It’s not like that,” Mitsuki recovered herself, taking Naoko by the hand and leading her down beside the koi pond, gesturing for her to sit down on the grass and following suit herself. “Nao-chan, a lot has happened in the last couple of months. You’re right, it’s a little crazy and it’s a little reckless... but I love him. I very nearly didn’t get to see him again — and I wasn’t going to leave him again without making sure that he knew it.”

“By invading his bed-chamber?” Naoko arched an eyebrow. “Mitsuki, I realise this might be a blunt assessment, but I hardly think that Ukitake-kun is the kind of man who expects you to compromise your honour in order to keep his attention. And if he did say anything like that to you, Captain or otherwise, I would take him to task on it — so trust me, you needn’t feel that...”

“It wasn’t like that,” Mitsuki put her finger to Naoko’s lips, shaking her head. “It was my decision, too. His and mine. We both know that we're not just friends. We never really were, but at the time, it was all we were mature enough to settle things as. The world was different to us then — but with all we've been through, it's made us both realise that there are some important things we can't let go of so easily. I can't marry him. I know that — it would be unwise for both of us right now, because we both have things to do. I can't be the wife of the Thirteenth Division District Captain any more than he can be the husband of a Healer who may be drafted anywhere at a moment's notice. With or without my father's consent, it's an impossible proposition — at least at the moment. But even if that's true, we're not 'just friends'."

She smiled sadly, lowering her hand.

"It's a different kind of bond between us, now," she murmured. "Juushirou is honourable. Taking this step for him is as good as us being married in his eyes, even without the formality and official papers to prove it. For me too, I suppose. When I went to Rukongai, he made me promise that I would come back, even if I fell in love with someone else out there... and I told him that I would, even if he found someone and wanted to marry them. This time, though, we both know that isn't going to happen. Neither of us can say that any more. Letting go of each other without that certainty is hard... and I know there's a good chance I'll go back to Rukongai when things have begun to calm down. How long for, I don't know — it's hard to say, but I'm committed to this life now, so I'll go where my Captain sends me. I suppose you could say that Juushirou and I have sealed our bond forever... and I can go back with no regrets or doubts about where I stand."

Naoko was silent for a moment, then she sighed, shrugging her shoulders.

"You've grown up," she owned at last. "I'd rather you didn't cavort around Ugendou at ungodly hours while you're here, though, if you don't mind. I understand what you're saying, and you're my friend so I would never turn against you, but I have a Division that requires some discipline and secrets about their Captain's love life aren't really things I want to field. Houjou's a great Vice Captain but hopeless at tact and nuance. Doubtlessly he'd singlehandedly fan the flames of scandal without even knowing anything about it — so please, no more late night rendezvous on Thirteenth Division's turf."

"I don't suppose it will happen here again. It's too risky," Mitsuki rested her chin in her hands. "I also made up my mind that I wouldn't ever come between Juushirou and his vocation. I knew mine when I left the Academy, but he was still looking for his. Now, I see it in his eyes each time he talks about Thirteenth. This role was made for him and I won't do anything to jeopardise it. I promise, Naoko. You have my word."

"Then I suppose I'll let it go," Naoko sat back on her hands, casting her gaze pensively across the surface of the koi pond. "I am glad you're here, and that you've recovered from your ordeal. I'm also glad that you've been able to see Thirteenth Division for yourself. Ukitake-kun might have been lost when you left, Mitsuki, but so was I. I wanted you to see that I'd done all right, too — and found my niche after graduation."

"I'm fairly certain Thirteenth wouldn't run half as smoothly without you," Mitsuki's eyes twinkled. "Juushirou did say that he was spoiled, having you and Houjou-kun to back him up. You and Sora have gone so far since I've been away... and I'm proud of you both. I might not ever match you, rank-wise, but I don't mind. We all took the things Sensei taught us and applied them in different ways... that's all."

"We did," Naoko nodded. "I always thought that nothing could be worse than being severed from the Clan world, but now I know how much it stifled me, and how much happier I am with the way things are now. I miss my family, but I write to them often, and they to me. They understand that I've made a choice, to be a warrior, not a healer, and so I suppose, now, if I wanted to go see them, they'd understand better if they saw blood on my blade. I haven't reached that point, yet... but maybe, one day, I will."

She pursed her lips.

"When I saw Keitarou, the other day, I was so angry I barely knew what I was doing," she admitted. "He came out of nowhere, and I knew I wanted to cut him down. All the emotions I had when Suzuno died, and after he used me like a rag doll... they all came flooding back. I thought I was over it — but I suppose it will take a little longer to heal than I had imagined."

"Some wounds don't heal," Mitsuki said thoughtfully. "They become scars, but those scars help to build us. Amai-san would approve of what you've done with your life. She'd be happy, I think, that you'd found your path."

"Yes," Naoko agreed, "but it doesn't change the fact terrible things have happened here once more because of that man. And even though he died... he's probably, somehow had the last laugh."

"Are you thinking about Kohaku?" Mitsuki asked curiously, and Naoko shrugged.

“Taichou wants him to stay with Thirteenth, and Houjou-kun doesn’t mind,” she said with another sigh. “I... I can’t overrule the two of them. It’s not as though I have any real reason for my feelings, just that when Taichou told me that Koku was Keitarou’s son... I suppose... I couldn’t help but put them together in my mind. I couldn’t help but remember the First Division officers... being so frightened when I couldn’t control my own body and when I thought I was going to kill Sora-chan with my sword. Maybe it’s prejudice... but honestly, I think it’s just fear, curled up inside of me, that has never completely gone away.”

She put a hand to her chest, spreading her fingers pensively over her heart.

“Houshi-sama knows that I’ve never entirely opened up to him since that day,” she added. “We work well together and I trust him, but I’m not willing to push my power further than it’s already gone. I’m not interested in reaching Bankai... because if doing so means that I’d be capable of the things Keitarou made me do, and worse... I don’t want it.”

Mitsuki was silent for a moment, then she put a reassuring hand on Naoko’s arm.

“I wish I had been here longer to help you get over it,” she said regretfully. “I’m sorry I wasn’t, but you don’t have to be afraid of Koku or his intentions. I can read him, Nao-chan. He’s frightened too, but he’s trying to be brave. He’s lost his whole family, like you did, in one way or another. Keitarou’s actions put him in a horrific position too, and made him do things he finds it hard to forgive. He and you are alike... and nobody has judged you for the things that happened in the past. Koku is no more responsible for Keitarou than you were, then. You are both his victims, and Koku wants badly to move forward and do something to make amends in whatever way he can. He’s not an Endou, nor is he Keitarou’s heir in any regard. He’s a scared boy with a tremendous power that he wants to learn to use. You understand being thrust into an alien world better than many... so don’t be afraid of him. He doesn’t mean you harm... I doubt he even knows what Keitarou put you through.”

“Probably not,” Naoko acknowledged. “It’s all right. I intend to do as you say, if I can. I’m just glad I had someone to talk to about it. That past is something that never gets talked about — it never has been, because I wanted it that way. In Seventh District, we didn’t have time to sit and fuss over the past, anyway. It was too dangerous and we had too much to do. We gelled as a team — Taichou, Houjou-kun and I — and they're neither of them men who harp back on things that are unnecessary. It's ironic,' she added ruefully, "but after chastising Houjou-kun for his casual manner for so long, I now find it refreshing and even reassuring. We are so different, and I do nag him — but he has no malice or spite to him, and I find it so much easier to work with. He says what he means, and so does the Captain... there's no Clan intrigue in Thirteenth, and I sure as hell don't miss that."

"It's funny, hearing you talk like that," Mitsuki admitted with a grin, "but you're happier now than you were then, so I have to believe you mean every word."

"I do," Naoko got to her feet, grasping Mitsuki by the fingers and pulling her upright, "but that's enough for this heart-to-heart. I'm going to meet Sora later and I have things to do before that. You need to get dressed and check on your patient before someone wonders if you've designed a new casual uniform for out of hours sessions... but if you want to come call by Eighth with me this afternoon, you'll be more than welcome. Sora already complains she hasn't seen enough of you — and I think the heavy workload is starting to wind up there, now that she and Souryou-kun have submitted their report on Ninth."

"I'll come," Mitsuki dimpled, nodding her head. "I'll go change and see Koku now, but I will come with you, later. Just, if you don't mind, let's not share with her last night's events? I love Sora to death, but in the circumstances..."

"Sora is the queen of gossip. I wasn't going to say a word," Naoko said wryly. "Come on. I'll walk you to your chamber. If anyone meets us I can tell them you were sleepwalking or something... it's almost the truth, anyway, considering what you're wearing."

"You'll keep it from Sora, but you're not going to hold off on teasing me, are you?" Mitsuki realised, and to her surprise, Naoko offered her a broad grin.

"Not a chance," she said matter-of-factly, linking her arm in her friend's. "Resign yourself to it, and let's go."

"Someone woke up on the right side of the futon this morning,"

At the sound of Shunsui's voice, Juushirou paused, shielding his gaze from the sun and casting his friend a rueful grin of acknowledgement, nodding his head. It was later the same morning and, having awoken, dressed and breakfasted far later than he normally would have, the Thirteenth Division Captain had finally entered the main barracks to find Enishi bearing down on him, an eager expression in his dark eyes. At first, Juushirou had been concerned about what his good-hearted adjutant was going to say, well aware that tact and discretion were not among Enishi's many qualities, but to his relief the man's urgency was in an entirely different direction — the news that a Hell Butterfly had arrived from Third Division, announcing a meeting of all the Captains in the Captains' Hall within the hour.

He had not intended on speaking to Shunsui about his night with Mitsuki, but Juushirou knew that his friend was perceptive enough to pick up on the flicker of emotion still lingering in his aura. It had been a big step for both of them — a line crossed that could not be uncrossed, but in the cold light of day, he did not regret it. They were bonded now in a way that he knew wouldn't ever be broken — and even if that was as far as it ever went, Juushirou knew that somehow, it would be enough.

That did not mean he was about to start sharing deep, dark secrets in a public arena, however, so he ignored Shunsui's enquiring expression, gesturing instead to the hall ahead.

"What's with the summons?" he asked, and Shunsui pursed his lips, a rueful glint in his dark eyes.

"You're changing the subject, which means that there's something you don't want me to know," he surmised. "From the general glow in your aura, I'm going to surmise it has something to do with a certain pretty healer currently lodging at your establishment... but it's all right. I won't ask indiscreet questions in public. We can always talk about it later over some warm sake... because I know you're not going to keep me out of the loop."

"There's nothing to discuss," Juushirou tried to sound detached, but Shunsui snorted, shaking his head.

"I'm not fooled," he said categorically, 'and besides, you should take pity on me. You might be sleeping well and in good company... a-hah!' as Juushirou flinched, his eyes opening wide in consternation. "Yes, I thought so. Well, you might be all rosy and happy, but I'm not finding sleep so easy to come by without copious amounts of good alcohol. Since apparently I mess up the Division paperwork twice as badly when hungover, you ought to be a good friend and provide me with juicy stories to distract me from taking such desperate measures."

"You're still not sleeping?" Juushirou latched onto this last part, and Shunsui sighed.

“You’re not going to bite on my hints and spill the beans, are you?”

“Not here, not now,” Juushirou shook his head, “but I am concerned, if you really meant what you just said. Are you really not sleeping? You look a little tired, but we’ve all been busy, lately. I haven’t been by Eighth in a day or two — I’m sorry. If I’d realised...”

“It’s not for you to patch me up,” Shunsui held up his hands. “I’ll be all right, Juu. I will. But, all jokes aside, I doubt this meeting is going to be a particular party event. I’ve done a lot of soul searching and I’d really like to be able to talk about something other than Keitarou’s invasion, but I’m certain this summons is going to be more of the same. As for my sleeping, I’ve discovered that not sleeping is preferable to having nightmares, and whilst lots of sake does do the trick, it’s not an ideal mental state for the morning after the night before, if you know what I mean. Plus, Sora isn’t generally amused at having to weave her way through empty bottles to get into my study. I don’t want to sound pitiful, but there are only so many times you can wake up in a cold sweat. I swear I’ve checked Amaki’s blade seven or eight times in the middle of the same night, just to make sure it isn’t really still dripping with Keitarou’s blood.”

“I’m sorry,” Juushirou’s eyes softened, and he rested a hand on his friend’s arm. “You can come to Thirteenth, later, if you like. You can come whenever you like, and I’ll listen. You said you’d be all right after the last time we talked, and with everything with Koku and the Council, then Tenichi, I wasn’t paying as close attention as I ought to have been — but I’ll make up for it. You don’t need to bury yourself in drink or deflect things with humour — not with me.”

“Killing people isn’t really in my nature,” Shunsui reflected, as the two men approached the hall. “So I like to tell myself, but the truth is, Juu, it is. It’s right there and always has been. Knowing that I can kill someone if I have to isn’t a nice thing to come to terms with. I don’t regret it, and before the Council, I won’t say a word of this. I did my duty, and that’s all fine and good so far as everyone else is concerned. Just, I’ve decided that I need at least one person I’m not going to lie to, and unfortunately for you, you’re it.”

“I don’t mind,” Juushirou assured him. “You did the right thing and we both know you did. So does Koku. He isn’t angry with you for anything. But what about Sora? You haven’t talked to her about it?”

“A little, but not much,” Shunsui reflected. “She’s been busy, and I’ve been thinking of other things. I had to discipline Shizuka, too — which reminds me, the brat wants to go visit Koku, when she manages to unbury herself from all the chores Sora’s pushed her way as punishment for staying behind without permission. She's in disgrace and she knows it — but they spoke after Tenichi's trial and she thinks that, since she fell over his legs, she ought to try and bridge a bond with him in some way. I think she's really doing it because she knows I'm not ready to... and since she knows what happened at Third Division, she feels it's her duty to go in my place."

"She's perceptive," Juushirou rubbed his chin. "Maybe she's right. Another olive branch, of a different kind? She's always welcome at Thirteenth, and besides, Koku will be recruiting formally when he's got a clean bill of health. The Council expect me to educate him, and so I will do, to the best of my ability, but in the meantime he can function as part of the squad. I think they'll give me a little time to bring both him and Izumi up to speed with the things they need to know — even if I have concerns over Izumi's sword skills, I expect she'll muddle through somehow."

"So the little vixen is staying, too?" Shunsui was surprised, and Juushirou nodded.

"She's become rather attached to Ketsui, shall we say," he responded, "and Joumei is happy with her being here, it suits him and is better for her. Yes, she'll stay. Her science will be useful, no doubt. I did ask if she'd rather transfer to a squad which focuses more on those things, but she turned the idea down. She wants to stay where she is — so I'll keep her and Koku both."

"New waifs and strays for the District Division, huh?" Shunsui offered a faint smile.

"Something like that," Juushirou agreed. "I was surprised that this summons was for Captains, though, not for the Council."

"It probably means they're going to rope the rest of us in to something," Shunsui said bleakly. "Maybe it has to do with the report from the Ninth, or what's going to happen there from now on. I don't know — but there's one way to find out. Push open the door of doom, Juu. I'm right behind you, I promise — I'm not going to run away."

Juushirou turned to give his friend a rueful grin, but did as he was bidden, and soon the two men were within the Captains' chamber, where other figures in neat white and black were already milling around. They were the last to arrive, and as they took their usual places, the spot normally occupied by the quiet, well-mannered Captain of the Ninth was noticeably vacant. Juushirou's eyes drifted to it, then to Shunsui, then to Hirata, and back to Anabomi's empty place, stifling a sigh under his breath.

I wonder if you're really happy with this, Keitarou — driving two of my closest friends to kill. Shunsui's more shaken by it than he's letting the world see, and Hirata's holding back the Wind Hawk because he has no choice. I wonder if you would have tried to make your son kill me himself, if it had gone according to your plan — or if you would've used Nagesu-sama or one of the others and put them through the same horror as poor Anabomi. I may not have known him well — I don't suppose any of us did — but losing a comrade is a deep blow.

His gaze flitted to Mareiko, taking in her demeanour thoughtfully. For once the Twelfth Division Captain was neatly turned out, her wild fair hair tamed in a long braid tied firmly with something that looked more like mooring rope than any kind of hair ribbon. She stood silently opposite him, raising a faint smile as she met his gaze, but there was preoccupation in her clouded pale eyes and Juushirou felt certain that Shunsui's deductions had been right. Mareiko had been the spy, and she had betrayed her comrades, yet Juushirou could see the shadows around her eyes and he could not feel angry. She was grieving too, he realised with a jolt, grieving and in shock at the betrayal of a man who had presented a false front to hide his evil, ambitious deeds. Despite himself he could not help stealing a glance at Atsushi — but he was as stiff and poe-faced as ever, not a single flicker of emotion in his thin features as he waited for the meeting to begin.

Juushirou let out a heavy sigh. Shunsui's fears were likely correct — it was going to be a dour, heavy gathering.

"We're all here, Nagesu-sama," it was Guren who spoke, a note of solemnity in his rich tones. "All of us who can be, at least."

"Indeed," Juushirou saw Nagesu glance towards the vacant position of Ninth Division Captain, then sigh. "Very well. I apologise for the hurried summons, but I felt that this ought to be handled here, in this sphere of politics, not within the halls of the Council. It has been correctly brought to our attention that the fight here was won by those of you who, for the most part, are not directly party to Council votes and decisions. That is undoubtedly the truth. For that reason, I would like to move that, for the foreseeable future, military decisions be passed here, and not in the Council Chamber. I have spoken with Tokutarou-dono, who has agreed to pass the Kyouraku vote to his brother in this respect — and so from this point on, we will seek to include the Captains of the five non-Council squads in decisions of Seireitei safety."

"Thanks, Niisama," Juushirou heard Shunsui mutter under his breath, and he shot his friend a wry smile.

“I have some proposals to put before the Captains,” Nagesu was still speaking, glancing at each of his companions in turn. “Some of them have been formulated from the last few days of Council Meetings, and all of them will be put to a vote here in this session to be passed or rejected. It is clear to all of us that this attack took us off guard in a worse way than we could have imagined, and that in many regards, communication channels broke down. We should have been able to neutralise this threat in a more effective manner, and if not for the intervention of a young boy currently at Thirteenth, we might all be in a much worse state. Grateful as we are for Kohaku’s interference, I am sure none of us likes to think that we might only be alive because of a scrap of a boy from the Rukon Valley.”

“It certainly does paint a different view of Seireitei, doesn’t it?” Hakubei mused. “I’m the first to admit, Nagesu-sama, if I’d known who the person was who broke Keitarou’s hold over me, I’d have unashamedly run over to find him and hug the life out of him... and I probably still would, if given the chance. Sora told me that Keitarou had planned to do the same to other Captains and kill far more people. Knowing how I felt and how powerful the control spell was... its a terrifying proposition. If Keitarou was able to control Clan Captains...”

“It would not just have been Inner Seireitei which would have been doomed,” Hirata murmured. Out of the corner of his eye, Juushirou thought he saw Mareiko flinch, but she kept her head held high, her focus fully on her Clan leader as he held up his hand to speak again.

“That is why I want us to talk here,” he repeated. “We lost one Captain in the recent conflict, and three high ranked officers of the Ninth Division were also killed. We must also not forget the loss of the Seventh Division Vice Captain, nor the deaths of the healers in the Spiritless Zone, or the four officers of the Fifth who died in the Real World. I am aware there are other officers lost in battle whose deaths we have not been firmly able to put against Keitarou’s name, though it seems certain blame should be in his quarter. We have, overall, been hurt grievously, and we still have several wounded. Mikiyara Hyakken is in a stable but serious condition — whether he will return to Ninth or not will depend on how he heals from this point on... is that correct, Retsu-sama?”

“He is stable,” Retsu nodded, “but he is still in need of much reconstructive work on his hands and arms in particular. It will be a long process, but I intend to do my best. He has not yet regained consciousness, though he is no longer sedated and I expect he will begin to wake soon. He has had a steady stream of well-wishers and visitors from both the Sixth and the Ninth Division in the meantime. I have sent word to his family in Sixth District, thanks to your Vice Captain's kindness in giving me the relevant information, Guren-sama — and I have heard that his daughter intends to come visit him in the not so distant future. I rather hope she might take him away with her and nurse him, once he is fit for convalescence, because I believe he will need some time away from the scene of battle to recover properly."

"Mikihara has a daughter? A wife? A family?" Shock registered on Mareiko's face all of a sudden, a stricken, guilt-ridden mask that confirmed once more for Juushirou that, spy or not, Mareiko had been more of a puppet than a true villain, and Guren nodded.

"He has one daughter," he agreed pensively. "His wife died in childbirth, I believe, and his daughter was mostly raised by his sister and her family. He confessed to me on one occasion that he had no idea what to do to raise a hime properly on his own, but he has always been very active in the girl's life. She married, not so long ago, and Anabomi and I agreed to give him three days leave to travel home to attend the wedding. He isn't the sort of man to ask or put his personal interests before his duty — a military man through and through. He is close to his daughter, though... I believe he will be happy she is coming to see him."

"I didn't know Mikihara had family," Shunsui's face was grave, and Juushirou knew that his friend was working out all the potential consequences of this revelation. "What about Anabomi? Does he have a family to mourn him back in Sixth, too?"

Now it was Hirata's turn to look troubled, but Guren shook his head.

"He never married, and he inherited his parents' manor when he was nineteen," he replied simply. "He had one much younger sister, who he largely provided for, but she was infirm and she died before reaching adulthood. He was a private man, even by Clan standards. I have not found any evidence in my papers that he had any other surviving immediate kin, only the wider ties of the overall Clan. His estate falls into my hands to manage as a result. I hope that I might make something useful of its existence within Sixth District, something that he would have approved of — but I must be certain there is nobody to inherit it first, so I have been researching old documents quite heavily these past few days."

“Poor Anabomi,” Hakubei murmured. “One tragedy after another.”

“He won’t be forgotten,” Midori said matter-of-factly. “He died in combat against a fierce and dangerous enemy. That is all that needs to be recorded. Our investigations and the reports surrounding them will be sealed. His honour will not be tarnished because he was a victim of Keitarou or that poison of Kusakawa’s.”

“It... was definitely Taichou... who created the poison Anabomi-taichou drank?” Mareiko asked hesitantly, and Nagesu nodded.

“All of our analyses indicate that the substance is not reidoku,” he agreed wearily. “I’m sorry, Mareiko. I kept you out of that test because I didn’t want you to have to deal with something so personally difficult, not after everything that had happened. The components of the formula match the notes we retrieved from the Real World. We have no surviving samples of the potion in its pure form from that laboratory, but notes recorded from the autopsies of mutated souls, both those in the Real World and those killed in Rukongai twenty five years ago show traces of that same formula in the blood. Whether Anabomi knew what he drank and whysoever Shougo-dono gave it to him, it was undoubtedly not Keitarou’s potion that turned Anabomi into a Hollow. It was Shougo-dono’s. And I believe, now, even without direct blood evidence from the corpse of Sakanoue Heiji, there is little to doubt that Shougo-dono was also responsible for his murder.”

“That is not exactly new information to me, Nagesu-sama,” Now, for the first time, Atsushi spoke, his voice tight and harsh as ever, and Nagesu inclined his head in acknowledgement.

“I realise that,” he agreed, “but now, at last, the scientific evidence backs up Kohaku’s vision and your story. I am sorry, Atsushi-dono. As the Head of the Urahara, I want to apologise to you for my kinman’s actions against you and your Division.”

Despite himself, Atsushi looked taken off guard for a moment, then he sighed, and Juushirou saw weariness and resignation in his colleague’s eyes.

“Heiji is dead. So is Kusakawa,” he said frankly. “Nothing can be done to change that, and so we move on. It is nice to have it acknowledged, but as I believe I told the Council — my lack of judgement was equally responsible for what happened that day. The truth is not pretty, but nothing can be achieved by clinging to it. Twelfth’s Captain was replaced, but now it is Ninth that needs our attention. I believe that was our subject of discussion, and we should return to it.”

“Atsushi-dono is right,” Yuuichi agreed. “We’ve heard enough of the past, but settling what really destroyed Anabomi won’t resolve the problem of what to do about the Division he left behind.”

“Ryu has kept me well abreast of Ninth, and they are all in shock at present, still,” Guren added gravely. “I have spoken seriously to him about whether he would consider leading them permanently if the need arose, but he feels strongly that he is not the right candidate and I cannot persuade him otherwise. There is nobody else within the Kuchiki whose name might be put forward, but Ryu is of the opinion that that doesn’t matter. He feels that it ought to be the right Captain, not necessarily one that comes from our Clan... because after the shock they’ve been through, Ninth need a particular kind of leader to pick them up and rebuild.”

“Twenty-five years ago we promoted Sekime to fill Kusakawa’s vacant position,” Kyouki pointed out. “Mikihara is not qualified to be Captain, if he recovers?” Guren shook his head.

“Hyakken is on the fringe of the Clan. He is skilled and very dedicated, but he would be the first to admit that he was far outshadowed by Anabomi,” he said grimly. “In his current condition of health, too, I wouldn’t like to put that pressure on him. If he heals, though, Ninth want him back as Vice Captain — Ryu has told me that not a day goes by when one of them fails to visit Fourth or asks after his condition. The patrols have all returned now, and it’s as Retsu-sama says... they’ve wanted to go see him, even if he’s not yet awake.”

“And the highest surviving officer in Ninth other than Mikihara..?” Kyouki asked.

“Sixth Seat,” It was Hirata who replied this time. “Takaoka Sakura, I believe her name is.”

“Takaoka has been very helpful to Ryu, and is apparently Hyakken’s most frequent visitor,” Guren agreed, “but she is not ready for that kind of promotion.”

“Takaoka...” Yuuichi looked surprised. “A Yamamoto? There’s a Yamamoto in the Ninth Division?”

“Anabomi believed in attracting recruits from outside of his Clan, apparently,” Shunsui interjected. “Sora and Kanshi have been producing a report about everything from Ninth, taking statements and I helped her compile bits of it the night before she submitted it to Hirata, Nagesu-sama and Guren-sama for review. Apparently he used to go to the Academy to speak to the students every few years, to try and broaden Ninth's intake. I think he was trying to think progressively — though I admit, I never would've imagined it, not of a man who was always so conservative in meetings."

"Anabomi liked to keep himself to himself, but he cared about Ninth more than anything or anyone," Hakubei said sadly. "Maybe, if his family background was as tragic as it sounds, he saw it as his surrogate family. As his neighbour, I talked to him sometimes, and his dedication to the Division was obvious. It doesn't surprise me that he'd go to those lengths... and it rather shames me that we find it out now, when he's not here to commend for it. More of us ought to be taking that step. More of us ought to be going and reaching out to the next generation of shinigami, instead of just assuming that our Clan kinsfolk will come to us automatically."

"I think Anabomi would approve of a Captain that wasn't necessarily a Kuchiki, based on that assessment," Midori said thoughtfully, "so long as his successor could be said to have Ninth's interests at their heart. I don't think you need concern yourself, Guren-sama, about not being able to put forward a Clan candidate. We've all acknowledged there needs to be changes. Right now there are four Clan Divisions who are nominally associated with particular Clans, but there's no reason for that to continue if it isn't appropriate. Hakubei-dono is right — we all ought to be widening our sphere. My brother has — his Onmitsukidou are a very motly bunch, but trained up to the skies and disciplined to death in the secret arts of my people, regardless of their background. I think this business has convinced me to do the same with Second Division."

She cast Juushirou a grin.

"I rather envy Juushirou's ability to take on recruits as he wants them, rather than having to go through heavy protocol," she added. "We've been training District students long enough that we ought to see better benefit from it and they shouldn't all be going to one squad. It's greedy of Thirteenth to claim sovereignty over all of District Seireitei, if we're restricted to recruiting mostly our own people."

"Eighth has District shinigami on roll, Midori-sama," Shunsui raised his hand lazily. "Nagasata Kaoru and Nakamura Hanako, to name but two. And my Vice Captain is not a Kyouraku. At least, not at the moment."

"Not... at the moment?" Kyouki jumped on this immediately, and Juushirou sent his friend a startled glance. "What does that mean, Shunsui? Have you done something to my daughter? Because if you're thinking of discarding her..."

“On the contrary, Kyouki-sama, I find Sora invaluable to me and to Eighth,” Shunsui held up his hands, shaking his head calmly. “I value her incredibly and I understand that she is irreplaceable. However, I intend to replace her — at least, I may have to, in the not too distant future.”

“Why?” Hakubei shot Shunsui a suspicious look, and Shunsui returned it with a benign smile.

“Because, listening to you people talk, I think it’s obvious who the next Captain of the Ninth should be,” he said evenly. “I know her best, so I know that even if I can’t spare her, I have to put her forward. I promised Sora that I would give her the chance to follow her own path and be her own person, and she isn’t my property to hold back. Shiba Sora is the kind of officer who can reignite life and hope into a broken Division like Ninth, and she has the skills and the ingenuity to lead without restraint. More, since she’s been with me from the start, she’s had experience of building a Division from scratch — and with so many higher officers lost, Ninth may well need that touch. Finally, though, Sora is heart more than she is anything else. Midori-sama said that the new Ninth Captain would need to be able to put Ninth’s interests as their priority... and I know Sora has always put Eighth’s interests above anything and everything else, including the ties of blood.”

His smile widened, but Juushirou could see his friend’s eyes were sad.

“I expect you wise people to all agree with my judgement,” he added frankly, “so therefore I’m pondering the problem of replacing her, before you take a vote.”

“Sora? As a Captain?” Kyouki looked floored, and Shunsui cast her a quizzical glance.

“You find that odd?”

“Well... no, but I just...” Kyouki gathered her wits, staring at him in wonder. “I underestimated you, as ever. I didn’t think you were training my daughter to take over Divisions in her own right — Divisions of foreign Clansfolk, no less!”

“It would be a third Shiba Captain,” Yuuichi mooted. “Do we want that, when we’re talking about reducing Clan monopoly?”

“Sora wouldn’t be a Shiba Captain,” Shunsui shook his head. “She came with me after the Academy because she didn’t want to be associated with her Clan when she was in uniform. It was an arrangement that suited us both — I got a very good Vice Captain out of the deal, which is why I was happy to go along with it for this long. But I have thought for a long time that to keep my word to her, I had to be ready to give her up when the time was right. I've done my best to give her all the chances possible to hone her leadership skills and her decision making is always first class. I think people forget,' he cast Kyouki a mischievous glance, "that she graduated fourth in our class at the Academy, behind Juushirou, Akira and I and Akira is only a Vice Captain because he chooses to stay in First Division, not because he couldn't be a Captain if the right position opened up. Sora obtained a higher final rank than Hirata, and nobody's questioning his right to wear the haori."

"I am the Head of the Endou, Shunsui. It comes with the territory," Hirata objected mildly, and Shunsui shrugged.

"But we're talking about a promotion on merit, this time," he said sensibly. "You and I were pushed into our posts by Clan obligation and we've done our best not to shame expectations. I'd like to think the both of us have succeeded, but we both knew we'd end up where we are now, one day. Juushirou had to earn his rank, but he's proven himself capable of running a Division and only a complete idiot would question his right to be among us, regardless of his birth. Why should Sora be any different? She has the skills. In terms of Clan bias, the ultimate test was this last uprising. I had to know she could follow my orders and fight for the Division she belonged to, even against her own Clan — and she did. She did her duty, and so I knew, then, that she was ready. Ninth's crisis is something unfortunate... but Sora is the solution to it, and I believe she is the best candidate for the job."

"I agree with Shunsui," Juushirou found his voice at length, offering Kyouki a smile. 'Sora's her own woman, and she's been that since I've known her. She's not judgemental, and she's good with people. I didn't know Shunsui intended to recommend her,' he shot his friend a glance, "but its a sensible recommendation to make, given the circumstances."

"You're not putting forward your own Vice Captain or Third Seat, Juushirou?" Midori asked quizzically. "If it comes to it, they're both experienced officers with the right skills and who have chosen duty over Clan. All the things Shunsui-dono has said about Sora-dono probably also apply to them, in particular the ability to put their Division first."

"Enishi isn't going to Ninth," Before Juushirou could say anything, Atsushi spoke up, a gruff note in his tones. "He's a Yamamoto, even if he is, currently, working in a District Squad.”

“Enishi would be capable of captaining someone’s sock drawer, if he was ordered to.” Shunsui reflected, “and in other circumstances, I would consider him Sora’s equal in terms of this kind of promotion. Juushirou chose him as his Vice Captain because we all knew that he was capable of being a great leader figure and so he’s proved. But, thanks to the Council’s new rules about shinigami and probational measures, Juushirou just found himself dealing with two rather labour-intensive new recruits, and he’s going to need all the help he can get to lick them into shape. Thirteenth is already the smallest Division in the Gotei, and taking one of their members seems unfair when there is someone like Sora who is just as capable of the task. Selfish as I am in knowing I personally don’t want to spare her, I know Eighth will adjust... but I imagine Juushirou wants Enishi to help train Izumi and Koku to meet Guren-sama’s expectations, and he should be allowed to do that. Besides, Atsushi-dono, we’ve agreed this isn’t about Clan. It’s about the best candidate for the job.”

“I know what it’s about,” Atsushi snapped back. “And I’m making it clear that Enishi won’t go to Ninth. I don’t care what Thirteenth do with their recruits, so long as, for the time being, they keep Enishi with his nose to the grindstone and don’t waste his abilities. I want him for Eleventh, when I’m no longer of any use to it — and even if Ukitake managed to convince him to be his Vice Captain, he won’t be able to do the same when it comes to something like this.”

“Woah, wait a minute,” Hakubei blinked. “Atsushi-dono, you’re not retiring?”

“No, I’m not,” Atsushi said bitterly. “But people can die when they least expect it and my Vice Captain is an inelegant, inadequate clot. He can just about muddle through at his current level, but if anyone gave him a haori he’d probably bring the whole Eleventh Division crashing down within a week due to his complete incompetence at anything except waving a sword. That being the case, Enishi is the only other eligible candidate — and given his quick response in this recent crisis, I’m persuaded that he’d be a safer bet. Of course, it would have helped if he had been my Vice Captain from the start — but recent events have indicated that I was not wrong to single him out then, and I have no intention of relinquishing my claim on him as a member of his family when all is said and done.”

Juushirou was struck speechless, his eyes huge, and he stared at the Eleventh Division Captain as though he had grown an extra head.

“You want Enishi... to be... your successor?” he managed at length, and Atsushi snorted, looking derisive.

“Your brain ought to move more quickly if you want people to give your squad the respect you think it deserves,” he said acerbically. “That is what I said.”

“And if Ukitake wanted him to be Thirteenth’s successor, what then?” Hakubei wondered. Atsushi snorted again.

“Thirteenth Division is a District Division,” he said matter-of-factly. “It would ruin the point of the exercise if a Clan member ever took it over — and besides, I’m fairly certain Ukitake is immortal. Irritating people, I’ve come to realise, often are.”

“I’m not sure if I should take that as a compliment to my officer or a slight against my squad,” Juushirou looked bemused. “I’m quite sure I’m not immortal, and I have no comment to make on being irritating, not if it gets my job done properly, but I hadn’t stopped and thought about Divisional succession in any regard. This has rather come up out of nowhere.”

“Perhaps to you,” Atsushi’s eyes narrowed to slits. “This whole business might be a ripple in your reality, but it isn’t the first time I’ve seen a Captain die unexpectedly, and I’ve learned it’s better to be prepared for what might lie ahead. I’m aware you were Enishi’s classmate, and that you appealed to his puppy loyalty to get him to join Thirteenth in the first instance, but the Gotei isn’t a school society, it’s a military operation and it requires long-term strategic thinking, irrespective of personal views. There are many things I’ve left unsaid for a very long time, but from this point, I’ve decided that I’ll say them and leave nobody in any doubt about my mind in these matters. Enishi’s actions during the crisis were commendable and it reminded me of the original reasons I sought him as Sakanoue’s successor.”

“If I remember right, you asked Akira first,” Yuuichi objected, and Atsushi shook his head.

“As a Yamamoto, not asking him would have been discourteous,” he said gruffly. “I knew he would not accept, and he was never my target. Akira-dono belongs in your squad, because he is a First Degree Yamamoto and anything else would be considered disrespectful to his status. I would not have expected a man like your brother to fall under the command of a lesser Clansman like myself. My real target was always Enishi. He had potential as a boy, and I knew he was the only other of his generation who could take Akira-dono’s sword, but in other ways he was too soft, too slow to adapt, too lacking in the ruthless edge to be a proper warrior. Then he skewered that Shihouin boy to protect Guren-sama's nephew and I knew Genryuusai-sama had finally made a soldier out of him. Of course, if Sakanoue had lived, it would never have mattered — but when he died, I knew that there was only one Yamamoto I could pass Eleventh onto and that there was no telling when that might become necessary.”

He glanced at the bewildered Juushirou.

“I didn’t anticipate your squad coming to life, or you getting in my way,” he added bitterly, “but I’m gratified to see that being under your command has not ruined his potential, Ukitake. I worried you would be soft on him and ruin what Genryuusai-sama had drilled into him. Your reputation for being everyone’s best friend didn’t fill me with confidence, but it seems he’s managed to reach his true strengths as a leader anyway. As a result, I feel that, if we, as Captains, are now going to have the independent right of vote and veto in the succession of our Divisions and those of our neighbours, I ought to make my feelings plain from the start. Houjou Enishi is not a candidate for Ninth Division. In Sakanoue’s absence, he is the only person I would consider handing over my squad to, and so I will not support his candidacy for any other Division, now or in the future. His blood and his combat training prove he ultimately belongs to Eleventh — wherever he chooses to serve now. My claim exists from a time prior to Thirteenth Division’s inception and, as I recall the Council deciding that a District squad ought not be led by a Clansman, I consider it still valid.”

“I’m sure Enishi has an opinion in this, and it’s a spurious topic for now, given that you’re still very much with us, Atsushi-kun,” Shunsui interjected drolly. “If your judgement about irritating people is correct, I’m sure that means we won’t be discussing Eleventh’s succession for a long while to come, either.”

“Or Eighth, apparently,” Atsushi snapped back.

“And Atsushi-kun might not have been here today, Shunsui-dono,” Mareiko spoke up now, her face pale and her voice shaking as she joined the conversation. “I could have killed him. It could’ve been much much worse. Atsushi-kun is right. We don’t know when we’re going to die. It’s good to be prepared for anything. Atsushi-kun is simply saying that Houjou is someone he’d like to succeed him at Eleventh... and I don’t think there’s anything wrong with that.”

Juushirou saw Shunsui’s eyes dart from Mareiko to Atsushi and then back to Mareiko, his eyebrows arching slightly with interest at the way she had come to the surly Captain’s defence, and he sighed, rubbing his temples.

“It’s an academic subject,” he said at length. ‘Atsushi-dono, right now Seireitei has a good Captain at Eleventh and a replacement is not needed. You said yourself that the priority now was Ninth and we’re getting distracted. As for Enishi’s current position, he chose to come to Thirteenth of his own accord, and if he chose to go to Eleventh — or anywhere else — in the future at any time, I would not stop him. However, I hardly think this level of discussion is relevant right now, since as Shunsui said, the duties currently put upon me mean I’m likely to need his skills in the near future. And, as for Naoko,’ he added, glancing at Midori, “she has no aspirations for that kind of promotion. There are reasons Naoko is in Thirteenth, and why she wants to stay there. She would not agree to her name being put forward for any of this, and at this time, I wouldn’t support it either. The subject has become diverted, but we were discussing Sora, and we should return to that line of thought.”

“Does anyone else have a candidate whose name they feel apt to raise for the candidacy of Ninth?” Nagesu fought to reassert his seniority into the discussion, and at the resultant silence, he sighed, removing his spectacles and rubbing his brow furiously before replacing them.

“Kyouki-dono, do you have any objections to your daughter being made a candidate for this Division?” he asked softly.

“Objection?” Kyouki snorted. “Not really. If Shunsui thinks she can do it, then all power to her. I am close to my daughter as a mother should be, Nagesu-kun, but I’m no longer her Clan overlord in the way I am to my sons. Sora has flown the Shiba nest and made her position quite clear as regards her duty and her family. It’s not for me to say she can or can’t do anything. She’s an adult and a good officer. Her Captain should have the last say on her candidacy, not me.”

“And Guren-sama? You would not object to a Shiba taking over a squad which, till now, has been in the hands of your family?”

“I have no objection to the candidate put forward,” Guren shook his head. “As I said, the only Kuchiki I have on hand with suitable experience is Ryuu, and my nephew is stubborn. He refuses to take a leading role and position because he is conscious of his other duties within the Kuchiki and therefore prefers to remain where he is. There is no rival candidate from my Clan to raise, and I have no issue with Shiba Sora, if her Captain does not.”

“We should take a formal vote,” Retsu suggested softly. “That is what you wish to happen, is it not, Nagesu-sama? That the Captains decide their successors by a majority, like the Council vote on whether to accept the new head of a Clan?"

"That is my hope, yes," Nagesu agreed. "For now, in the absence of a better and more stringent method, a majority vote seems the most adequate. Shiba Sora's name has been raised by Shunsui-dono and Ukitake has seconded it. Kyouki-dono and Guren-sama have not objected. We should therefore vote on her nomination. Are there any who are against such a proposition?"

Again, silence, and Nagesu nodded.

"Then, Shunsui-dono, the Captains task you with informing Shiba Sora of their decision," he said quietly. "She has the right to refuse, of course, but I hope you will impress on her the things you said to us here today."

"Sora won't refuse," Shunsui said matter-of-factly. "I will speak to her this evening, Nagesu-sama. Thank you."

"Then that brings me to other matters of change I wanted to table here today," Nagesu sighed again, then turned his attention back to the hall as a whole. "First, however, Hirata-dono — I understand you have selected a new Vice Captain for Seventh Division?"

"Yes, sir," Hirata inclined his head. "I intend to nominate Kitabata Hajime as my adjutant. I have received both his consent and the support of my Third Seated officer, and so I would seek to make this position official as soon as possible. Seventh is in a state of disarray and there is much to do. My son's ghost would be unhappy if I tarried any longer."

"So it begins, huh," Kyouki murmured. "A Vice Captain who is not the child of a Clan leader in a central Clan Division... Kikyue-hime does not mind?"

"Kikyue understands best of all why I've done what I've done," Hirata said gravely. "It's as Atsushi-dono said in the Council meeting. We put those we care for in dangerous positions and we fail to use our judgement to protect them. We ought to be more militarily minded. Lives can be protected that way. Hajime is not as high born as my son or as Kikyue, but he is an effective, loyal officer without whom I would have been lost these last few weeks. I want someone I can trust at my side, and someone I don't feel I need to protect. Hajime is that person."

"I see," Kyouki looked pensive. "I have yet to decide what to do when Ryuusei recovers his health. He is my eldest son and my Clan heir, but he has expressed to me his own uncertainty as to whether he can continue in his current role with the loss of his left arm. I haven't let him resign, not yet — but I am starting to think that perhaps it's time Clan and squad successions diversified... much in the way that Eighth already has."

"Whatever we decide, all candidates for Vice Captain must present themselves and prove their worthiness to take the post." Yuuichi said frankly. "I'm not saying that either Ryuusei-dono or Souja-dono have ever been lacking in their ability, but from this point on, we cannot afford familial bias. Originally, Akira was made Vice Captain of my squad because my son was still training, but his reiryoku will never make him a better Vice Captain than Akira, and one day, Akira has the capacity to be a Captain in the way my heir never will. These recent events have persuaded me that I would sooner have the stronger officer lead First, even if that means moving away from the Clan leader, than let a weak link destroy the whole chain."

"It's a harsh way to put it, Yuuichi-dono, but you are not wrong," Guren rubbed his chin. "Sixth Division relies very much on my two nephews, and I regret that that is the case. I think it unlikely the Kuchiki will welcome such a separation — but I do intend to make sure every Kuchiki is far more rigorously trained and disciplined before I let them near Sixth."

He glanced at Kyouki.

"Your daughter will take Ninth, and I will relinquish all control of its actions," he added, "on the understanding that the Shiba, the Urahara and the Yamamoto to do the same with their secondary squads, irrespective of who currently leads them. Ninth, Tenth, Eleventh and Twelfth are not Council Divisions. They should not be answerable to another Captain when in uniform, otherwise we are giving them less power to operate than we gave Ukitake when we allowed Thirteenth Division."

"Juushirou will do as he pleases whether we sanction it or not," Midori looked amused. "I think we can all learn from this particular uprising, though. Retsu-sama, I suggest that Fourth Division begin combat training with a more serious attitude. Atsushi-dono spoke harshly, but he was still right. We are a military organisation, and we have certain responsibilities to those we protect — both here under our command, and out in the Districts and Rukongai."

"I will speak to you on that subject," Retsu agreed. "Fourth Division must, as you say, learn to adapt to the changes as much as any other squad.”

“Then, if we are severing the direct influence of the Council over the Captains in terms of military matters, what of the position Nagesu-sama currently holds?” Hakubei asked. “Currently, only the Clan leaders are allowed to hold the command post during the Council Leader session, and that excludes five squads. Ukitake is permanently excluded from it, and he doesn’t have a Clan leader he can ask nicely to help him out. Thus far, Shunsui has also been excluded on the grounds that he’s not Leader of his Clan, so cutting out the Kyouraku, too. If we’re changing that, then surely we should be making sure there’s a more stable system of authority in this chamber, too?”

“I was coming to that,” Nagesu agreed. “We are not in a position, yet, to elect an overall Captain Commander to permanently remain in sovereignty over us all without creating political unrest, but I agree that it should be a post that rotates equally between all Captains on an annual basis. We will continue as we always have until Hirata-sama’s tenure is concluded, at which point we will move to pass the duty to Shunsui-dono, and then the new Captain of Ninth, then yourself, Hakubei-dono, then Atsushi-dono, Mareiko and Ukitake, before returning to the First. It need not correlate with the Council changes in power. The Council and the Captains are no longer necessarily duplicates of the same authority... one day, it strikes me that we might well live in a world where Clan leaders are no longer automatically Captains of Divisions... nor squads divided based on their family allegiances. I can see the seeds of those changes already beginning now, with Sora-dono’s nomination and with Hirata-dono’s suggestion for his Vice Captain. We should be ready to allow such changes to happen, if they mean we can protect the people of Soul Society more effectively.”

“You have been doing a lot of thinking,” Kyouki let out a low whistle. “Nagesu-kun, have you had any time to sleep at all whilst dreaming all this up?”

Nagesu cast Kyouki a wry smile, then shrugged his shoulders.

“I will, now that I have unburdened my beliefs to you all,” he admitted. ‘As... as the first official “Captain Commander” and leader for this session, I feel particularly responsible for the harm caused — and therefore, particularly committed to ensuring it can’t happen in the same way again. We have mistakes we should learn from, and I’m determined that we will. As a result, I should like to go one step further, if I may.”

He gestured to Juushirou, who started, eying the Urahara leader in confusion.

“Nagesu-sama?”

“Thirteenth Division is a District squad, but there has been too much talk of this for my liking,” Nagesu offered Juushirou a smile. “The way in which we separate it from ourselves could be interpreted as the grossest level of disrespect. I am aware that it was thanks to your judgement, Ukitake, that Keitarou’s son was persuaded to change sides and that your initiative helped pave the way for our victory. You were not wrong with the things you said before the Council, even if we did not wish to hear them. The Clan era is not over, but we must evolve if we are to keep pace with the changes that are happening all around us. This is no longer a Seireitei where we should consider ‘Clan’ and ‘District’ blood when it comes to Divisional membership. Anabomi went to the Academy, well, as Hakubei-dono suggested, so should we. Shunsui-dono has mentioned District recruits in Eighth, but after twenty five years, we ought to be doing more. The District population is far greater than that of all the Clans put together. Ultimately, if Genryuusai-sama keeps training at the rate he is, and the Academy keeps growing, we will have more District officers than Clan ones in our ranks. If we want the Gotei to survive the transition, we must stop drawing lines in the sand. My original fears regarding this related to underground Urahara looking to support Keitarou’s rebellion by entering squads and causing them harm, but it’s been brought to my attention that it was the pure-blooded, respectable Urahara who I really should have been wary of, not those who my father cast out. That judgement was forged from ingrained Clan bias, but it could have killed us. We need to open our eyes — and our Divisions.”

“Meaning?” Atsushi demanded.

“Meaning that all squads should be open to District and Clan applicants, and that new shinigami should have the right to choose where they apply to train,” Nagesu said frankly. “Just as Takaoka decided to go to Ninth, and Houjou and Shikibu chose Thirteenth, I should like to see more people have the freedom to leave their roots behind if they feel it appropriate they do so, without facing censure. Shiba Sora is proof that such a decision can work out in Seireitei’s favour. Let’s move on that momentum and make sure that there are no more barriers to opportunity among our Divisions.”

“If I may say so, Nagesu-sama, the people of the Districts often know first hand the pain of losing loved ones to Hollow raids,” Juushirou said gravely. “I’m one myself — I lost my father, because, then, there were not enough shinigami to take care of every danger. Many of my squad are likewise — either orphans of Hollow attacks, or abandoned by family who feared the spirit power that drew the monsters near. I would welcome anyone to oin Thirteenth, if they felt it was a place they could belong — and I would also welcome other squads doing the same. I don't consider Thirteenth to have a divine right to District individuals — which Shunsui and Hirata's recruitments have proven — and I would fully support this change, if the other Captains would give it their consideration."

"Then, if we are going to take this step — and I should also support it, if I may," Retsu interjected, "I should like to ask the support of all Divisions in the patrolling and policing of Rukongai from this point on. We act too much as separate squads, sometimes, and Midori-sama is right about the Fourth's lack of military will. I believe that our duties on the other side of the barrier will become considerable and will continue to grow as we improve the balance of the worlds, bringing more souls here. We must go to the Real World more often, not simply lurk in Seireitei. We must embrace all facets of a shinigami's duty, and it will take all of us to achieve. However, Nagesu-sama's suggestion may make it possible — because we will have an influx of members which we have not had before, allowing us to do more things we need to do."

"What are your proposals, Retsu-dono?" Guren asked curiously, and Retsu smiled sadly.

"The Fourth will retain their responsibility for Rukongai, and I will deploy patrols there for longer or shorter periods of time to ensure the needs are met," she said, "but I would like the support of other Divisions on a rota basis to provide military support and to help clear Hollows. I believe we have enough Divisions to divide up Rukongai and Real World patrol responsibilities in the way that, once, Eleventh and Twelfth covered — but without the pressure resting on one or two squads alone. If each squad provided officers to serve a month's tenure in each place in a calendar year, that should suffice. We all need to do everything, where we can — so that something like what happened with Kusakawa Shougo can never be allowed to happen again."

"I support this motion," Mareiko raised her hand, her face pale but her eyes determined. "I have such bad memories of Rukongai, but I will go back. I will go back and I will kill Hollows. I will go there, Retsu-sama, and try and regain the trust of the people that my Captain betrayed when he hurt them. I understand the depth of the sin that hangs over Twelfth Division, and the fear he must have instilled into so many people there — but I will go and I will help try to change that.”

“Fine words, Sekime, but I thought you couldn’t fight any more?” Hakubei touched his right arm speculatively, casting Mareiko a quizzical glance, and Mareiko met Atsushi’s gaze. The Eleventh Division Captain nodded.

“I am working with Mareiko to improve her combat with her left arm, and there is nobody in Seireitei with a better grasp of Kidou,” he said evenly. “We don’t need any Captains who are simply here to make up the numbers, and Mareiko is capable of pulling her weight as much as any other.”

“Then we should vote on the proposals put forward, as they will mean big changes for many of us,” Hirata said grimly. “I and Seventh are in favour of all stated. Even if they are hard to implement at first, in the long run, they can only be beneficial. If we’re hating and fighting each other based on birthright, we aren’t going to see the real enemies — and now that Keitarou is dead, we ought to make sure that there’s little chance for anyone else to come take his place. We are at peace, and hopefully, soon, will have a full complement of Captains and Vice Captains once more. We should move to look forward... and if that means that Clan and District shinigami end up fighting side by side from this point on, well, so be it.”

The sun was beginning to dull behind clouds over District Two, as the two shinigami reached the Inner Seireitei gate, identifying themselves to the officers on duty before ducking through the barrier and out into the landscape beyond. The world seemed tranquil beyond the stone walls that divided them from Outer Seireitei, and Ketsui wondered absently if the people hereabouts had any idea that the stability of the whole world had almost come crashing down around them. In the distance, he was aware of the muffled sounds of a market in full swing in one of the local villages, and in the sky overhead, birds dove and wheeled, teaching young ones to leave the nest for the first time. It was like a different world, and gazing around at it, Ketsui found it hard to believe that, such a short time earlier, they had all been in such mortal danger.

A nudge in his back alerted him to the impatience of his companion, and he turned, casting her a rueful smile. Izumi was perfectly turned out in impeccably clean and neat shinigami uniform, her silvery hair braided back from her face with the exception of two beaded strands that hung down over her right ear. Joumei had explained to Ketsui that it was a tradition of their family passed down over many generations, a symbol of the first-born hime of the noble line, yet the carved beads somehow only served to enhance Izumi's elfin prettiness, and remind Ketsui of how young she really was. Right now, however, there was nothing pretty or noble in her expression, for her brows were knitted together in a frustrated scrunch, lips pressed together in a thin line of irritation. She gave him another push in the back, putting her hands on her hips and glaring at him, and Ketsui could not help but smile, holding up his hands in mock surrender. She was younger than him, less experienced with a weapon and, he knew now, unable to use her one party trick to bring him down — but despite all of this, she was not afraid to be rude to him, and although she could not say the words, Ketsui was left in absolutely no doubt about what her expression meant.

“I’m really not sure that I’m ready to do this,” he admitted, looking sheepish. “I know I said I would, and I told Kohaku I would as well, but now we’ve left Seireitei... I’m not so sure. I’ve not walked through District Two before, and what if they aren’t willing to allow me in? It’s a difficult situation, and besides...”

Izumi let out a gusty sigh, shaking her head in obvious annoyance. Sliding delicate fingers into Ketsui’s own sword-calloused ones, she gave his arm a little tug, before setting off purposefully on the path ahead without bothering to see whether or not he was choosing to come along. Taken off guard, Ketsui found that if he did not follow his impetuous companion, he would likely fall flat on his face and be dragged there with his nose to the ground, for Izumi, despite her petite stature, was not the kind of person to back down when she had decided to do something.

“Okay, okay, I’m coming!” he protested, quickening his pace to keep up with her resolute steps. “I know that Midori-sama told Taichou that it would be all right, if I went, and that the guards would be expecting me. I know there’s no reason for me not to do this now, except that I’m not sure about how to... well... deal with it.”

Izumi stopped dead suddenly, causing Ketsui to almost overbalance once more, fixing him with obstinate silver eyes. Her fingers loosed from his, and she fluttered them together, the words mostly lost on her companion but the emotion behind them not. Although he was still mystified by most of Izumi’s gestures and signs, there were a couple which came up with enough regularity that he had learned them, and as he watched her fingers twitch into the sign for ‘idiot’, he let out a rueful sigh. Slowly he shook his head.

"I might be an idiot, but Ten-nii is my brother," he said softly. "I love him and I want to put things right between us, but the man who drew his sword on you is a man I never saw before. I am being a coward, I know I am, but I'm afraid. I've spent my whole life looking up to Ten-nii, only to see him fall apart in front of me. And whilst I don't regret standing forward to protect you — I'm worried about what happened to my brother."

Izumi's expression changed at this, and Ketsui saw a flicker of guilt surface in the girl's beautiful eyes. He shook his head.

"It's not your fault," he assured her, resting his hands on her shoulders, and though she flinched slightly at the contact, she did not pull away. "I did what I was ordered to do, and I did what was right. I wasn't going to let anything happen to you — we're allies, right? It's just a lot to get my head around. It's like if Joumei-dono was to attack you all of a sudden, or attack someone you wanted to protect. How would you feel about it — confused, right?"

Izumi pursed her lips pensively, and Ketsui could see her considering his words carefully. She let out another sigh, then, very gently, pulled free of his hold, sliding her arm into his instead. Unlike the grab-and-drag technique, Ketsui realised that this was more a gesture of support, and he cast her a grin.

"I know. You're here with me for moral support, and because if I don't go through with it, you won't let me hear the end of it," he said ruefully. "For someone who doesn't speak, you're frighteningly good at nagging. Joumei-dono warned me that you've never let not having a voice stop you from making yourself heard, and he's not wrong. I know you came with me just as much to make sure I settled with Ten-nii, and I won't go back. I just don't know how I feel about it. It's a lot to deal with. That's all."

Izumi's expression had become indignant, but at these last words, her eyes became grave and she nodded. Her fingers flickered slightly, and though Ketsui could only make out one or two words, he knew that she was telling him how much she felt to blame.

"I know you want me to make up with my brother, because you understand how important he's always been in my life," he reflected, as they began to walk along the long, narrow path that led to the labour encampment where Tenichi had now begun to serve his sentence. "You don't have a mother or a father to look out for you, either. It's always been Joumei-dono, hasn't it, who's kept you safe? And now, everything is changing for you too. You are sure about staying in Inner Seireitei, aren't you? You don't regret telling Taichou that, when he spoke to you and your brother?"

Izumi pursed her lips thoughtfully, and Ketsui was surprised to see a faint flush of pink surge into the pale cheeks. Slowly she shook her head, but she studiously avoided his gaze, and the fingers which were so often active remained still. Ketsui eyed her for a moment, then a faint smile touched his lips.

"I see," he teased. "You didn't think I could cope, looking after myself, so you decided to stay and sort my life out for me. Is that it?"

Izumi's eyes shot up at this, embarrassment and anger flaring in their depths, then, as she saw his grin, a glimmer of a smile touched her own lips and she shrugged, an attempt at nonchalance that fooled Ketsui none at all. A sense of warmth flooded through him at this obvious proof of her true feelings, but he did not pursue the matter, instead turning his gaze to the path ahead.

"Well, I'll make sure to thank Joumei-dono for sparing you before he goes back to District Seven," he reflected. "In the meantime, I think we're almost there. Midori-sama told Taichou that the compound was outside of Inner Seireitei, but only a short walk across District Two. Judging by the roofs I can see beyond those trees, I guess that must be it. I don't know what kind of a place it is, Ichimaru-san, but I suppose it's better than wherever he was being held before. Kirio-nee spoke to him when he was in the deep cells... and apparently they were pretty bleak. This is a labour camp, true enough, but it looks as though the complex at least has windows."

Izumi did not reply, and as they rounded the copse, Ketsui could see the whole establishment for the first time, letting out a gasp at the sheer size of the undertaking. It was a huge stone structure, clearly built as a Clan run penal establishment in times gone by, and now reserved exclusively for those sentenced to lesser level crimes. If Tenichi had been found guilty of treason, he would've remained in the Maggot's Nest until an execution date had been set, but this place had lower level security, and though there were guards on every gate, the windows were only barred, not covered with heavy metal grills. Tenichi's fellow prisoners were not all shinigami, but Ketsui knew that every prisoner sentenced here with spiritual ability was forced to wear spirit cuffs day and night, and he rubbed absently at his own wrists, hating the thought of having his communication with his sword cut off for such a long period of time. Reihahen had been delivered into Hirata's custody until such time as Tenichi was entitled to return to service, and Ketsui realised that, in coming here, his brother had returned to being just another District individual who had crossed the system in the wrong way.

“Ichimaru-san, I’m not sure they’ll let you come with me,” he said now, gazing up at the structure. “You’re the one Ten-nii attacked, and Taichou said Midori-sama would probably not approve of you playing visitor. Not even if you are here to support me — I think it’s part of the sentence protocol with assault. Even though I’m certain Ten-nii won’t hurt you again, and he acknowledged his own mistake in doing so in court, they wouldn’t want to risk it. You might have to wait outside — do you mind if you do?”

Izumi snorted, then shook her head, tugging slightly on his hakamashita sleeve as if to tell him not to be silly, and Ketsui offered her a grin.

“Okay. I suppose you wouldn’t have come this far if that were the case, so it was a stupid question,” he admitted. “With so many guards, you should be safe enough here. If anyone tries to hurt you, go to them. Don’t lay anyone out with your hypnosis if you can avoid it — because I’m pretty sure you’re not supposed to do that outside of Inner Seireitei until your probation is over and the Council accept your right to stay. I don’t want you thrown out, so be careful, all right?”

He turned to go, but Izumi had not released her hold on his sleeve, and he glanced back at her, confused.

“Ichimaru-san?”

Izumi’s cheeks were read, but she met his gaze defiantly, shaking her head. Ketsui stared at her in bewilderment, not understanding for a moment what she was trying to convey.

“Ichimaru-san, I’m going to see Ten-nii. You dragged me here, why are you...”

He trailed off, for Izumi had shaken her head again, grabbing more tightly onto his sleeve and giving it another tug. It was impossible for her to go any more red, but as Ketsui moved to detach her hold from his clothing, he saw her mouth something, and it made her pause.

Three syllables, silent, but unmistakably,
I-Zu-Mi.

His eyes widened, colour flooding his own cheeks as he realised what the girl had wanted to say.

“I..zumi?” he murmured, and Izumi dropped her gaze, her head jerking forward in an embarrassed nod.

“You want me to call you Izumi? Not Ichimaru-san, but Izumi? Is that what you wanted to say?"

Another jerky nod, with Izumi's eyes still buried into the turf, and Ketsui hurriedly got a grip on himself, grasping her lightly by the shoulders and giving her a little shake.

"I got it, and I'm sorry. I'll call you Izumi, if that's what you want," he said firmly, hoping that his own cheeks were not blazing as hotly as hers still were. Gently he cupped his hand beneath her chin, raising her face to his, and though she slid her gaze away from him, she made no attempt to push him away. For a moment he glanced at her, then he laughed sheepishly.

"I'll call you Izumi, and you can call me Ketsui," he said at length. "Though you'll have to teach me how to say my name in your language... because I'd like to know when you're using it, just like you want to hear me say Izumi."

Izumi's expression could not become more mortified, but, as she seemed to realise that he was serious and not mocking her, she raised her hands, slowly and surely shaping out three clear, concise syllables of her own. As she did so, her lips mouthed Ke-tsu-i, and as she repeated the gestures, Ketsui grinned, grasping hold of her fingers and covering her tiny hands with his own.

"Right. I've got it," he said playfully. 'Now I know what my name looks like, I'll know when you're calling me properly. And remember, I already know how you sign idiot. So I'll know the difference. Bear it in mind, huh? I'm still your senpai and your trainer, even if we are friends outside of squad. No, maybe something other than friends,' as Izumi eyed him doubtfully. "I don't know. I'm not used to it, and I don't suppose you are, either. But that's fine. We don't really need to put it into words... I've learned that most of all from spending time with you. Not everything can be or should be said out loud. So for now, we won't say it. All right? I'll call you Izumi, you call me Ketsui, and we'll go from there."

He patted her gently on the shoulder, then,

"And now, I'm going to go see my brother, and I'm going to be honest with him about everything," he said frankly. "You, me, Thirteenth, and how I feel about what happened between us. I want to support him and be there for him when he's released, but I also want him to heal. He has to accept that you're not just my duty to protect, but someone I care about... and even if it's strange, I don't think that will change. I like that you're staying with Thirteenth Division, Izumi... and I'm going to make Nii-chan understand that too. He's not the only person who's important in my life, and he doesn't need to take care of me any more."

He tilted his head on one side, considering.

"Do you think if I tell him that, he'll understand?" he wondered, and Izumi arched an eyebrow, her embarrassment gone as she fixed him with one of her looks. At the sight of it, Ketsui grinned.

"I know. He's my brother, so I ought to give him the opportunity to try," he admitted. "All right. This time, I really am going. Wait for me, Izumi, and don't get yourself into trouble. We've the whole afternoon free, so after I've seen Ten-nii, maybe we can walk into the local town and see the market. Since you spent so much time underground, I guess you haven't done that all that much — and it might be nice, after so much hiding and secrecy, to step out into the world for a change."

He eyed her mischievously.

"Well? Will your hime pride allow you to do something so ordinary?" he teased, and indignation flooded Izumi's features. She tossed her head, stalking off towards the trees, but just as she seemed likely to disappear back into them, she turned, meeting his gaze once more and this time Ketsui could see genuine warmth reflected back in the argentine eyes. Slowly she nodded, then was gone into the copse to wait, and Ketsui took a deep breath, turning his own attention back towards the penal building.

Okay, Nii-chan. Time for you and I to have a proper heart to heart about everything and anything. I hope we can put it behind us and rebuild, but my life isn't as simple as it might have been before, nor do I want it to be. Kirio-nee may be right about my attachment to Izumi. I certainly know that I don't want her anywhere but by my side, and that's probably a good sign that our connection is more than just a working relationship. I need you to understand that too, Ten-nii. Our future relationship probably depends on it. Like Midori-sama said in court, I don't need your protection. This time, I want to try and protect you — if I can — so here's hoping you open up and let me.

78. Reborn

Chapter Seventy Six: Reborn

It was a murky morning, with hazy grey clouds showing signs of an impending summer storm. Sora paused for a moment to glance up at the heavens, a rueful smile touching her lips as she realised how the undecided sky so perfectly reflected her own unsettled mental state. She took a deep breath into her lungs, striding purposefully under the distinctive banner of the Fourth Division triage, bowing her head to acknowledge the salute of the officer on duty and crossing the bustling courtyard towards the small wing of rooms which she knew housed the most seriously ill patients. It was the most secluded part of the Division's network of sickrooms, and she had never had cause to visit it before, but this time there was no avoiding it and, as she reached the door, she said a silent prayer under her breath before pushing it open and marching inside. Nobody had challenged her presence or questioned her sudden arrival, making her certain that rumours were already spreading around Seireitei, but though she disliked the sense that she was under silent scrutiny, she knew there was no running away. This was the first obligation of a whole itinerary of obligations, and she could not balk at the first hurdle.

Shunsui had gone back to Thirteenth after the Captain's meeting the previous day, leaving her with free reign over the Division, and in his absence she had managed to get a good deal of work done. All the dispatched patrols had trickled back through Inner Seireitei's main gates now, and she had therefore passed busy but otherwise average hours taking reports, assigning duties and bringing her members up to speed on the events that they had missed. It had seemed like another completely ordinary day in an Inner Seireitei that was slowly beginning to find its peacetime rhythm after the shock of Keitarou's coup, and the visit of Mitsuki and Naoko over lunch had made her observe jokingly that they ought to make more time to get together, just girls, in the way they had always used to do.

And then, Shunsui had come back, and the moment he had called her to his office, everything had been turned on its head.

His method of breaking the news had been characteristically casual. He had dropped down behind his desk, taking time to rearrange the papers she had piled so neatly back into their usual mingled mess before asking whether there had been any word from Tokutarou on the fixing of his white haori. Then, in his next breath, it had come.

“By the way, I recommended you for the Ninth Division Captaincy.”

It had been so off-hand that to begin with, Sora had been convinced it was one of his jokes. In fact, she had been about to comment that he was starting to sound back on his usual form when she had met his gaze, and the seriousness she had seen lurking there had killed the riposte before it could leave her lips. Instead she had stared at him in mute disbelief, and Shunsui had nodded, gesturing for her to sit down.

“They approved my suggestion,” he had added, and this time there had been no mistaking the real intent in his words. “I hope you haven’t made long-term plans for the next few weeks, because I think they will want to move quickly, now they’ve come to a conclusion about what to do.”

At the memory, Sora closed her eyes, inwardly suppressing a groan.

It would have been nice, Shunsui, to have had some warning about what you were planning to do yesterday. Even if you’d just told me at breakfast before you left — that would’ve been something. To come home and tell me it’s a fait accompli and that I should be all prepared to move out and take up a post in a completely alien Division... not just that, one where half the senior officers just got murdered by a terrorist... that’s the kind of thing you want some time to think about. For their sake as well as mine... but then I suppose you didn’t want to give me that chance to find a way out.

She opened her eyes, letting out a heavy sigh.

You know I love Eighth. You know I love working with you, and that I wouldn’t choose to end our partnership, no matter how much I nag you. We’re more than siblings, more than friends... we’re a team that works well and I felt it especially when you trusted me to take charge of the Division when you went after Keitarou. I know you have always respected me in the way you promised that you would... and I know this is a part of it. You think that it would be easy for me to become complacent and cling to our friendship because it’s comfortable, but it’s not what you have in mind for me, and, if I’m honest, I’m a little flattered by that fact.

She ran her fingers along the patterned walls of the Fourth, a self-conscious expression crossing her features as she considered it.

“You’re the obvious choice,” Shunsui had told her simply. “I don’t want to get rid of you, so don’t glare at me like that. You’re the best Vice Captain I’ll probably ever have, but that’s why I can’t keep you. I’m not your kin and I told you that I wasn’t taking you as my Vice Captain because I intended to protect you or shield you from danger.

You wanted to forge your own path. This is that path. Ninth Division needs you more than I do. I have Tetsuya, and I have Kaoru, and I will be all right, even if my office won't ever be as tidy as it is under your regime. But it's all right — we'll still be neighbours, so if you want to come yell at me about my bad habits, you know you'll always be welcome."

I need to live up to that faith in me.

At last Sora reached her destination, resting both hands against the door of the final chamber.

You're right, Shunsui — I won't refuse the challenge that the Captains have laid down before me. I will do my utmost to put back together the shattered pieces of this division, using every trick and skill I've learned during our twenty five years together. But, before I do all of that, I need to come here. I have to talk to the one person whose opinion on this is more important than yours or anyone else in Seireitei's.

Gently she rapped on the door of the chamber, half expecting there to be no answer, but instead, a female voice called her in, and she faltered for a moment, then pushed back the door, stopping dead as she registered the scene before her.

An unfamiliar young woman stood by the window, replacing the wilting flowers in the vase on the sill for fresh ones. She was not a member of the Fourth, for she was dressed in unmistakeably Kuchiki robes, delicate yet simple, as though she were of Clan blood, but of modest background. Her dark hair was drawn back from her face in a neat style, and at her entrance, she turned, offering the shinigami a faint smile.

"I'm sorry," Sora bowed her head hurriedly, suddenly feeling out of place. "I didn't realise Mikihara had company... I was told that he had regained consciousness, and so I thought..."

"He's drowsing, but he has been awake and we've spoken," the girl set the fresh vase back in its original location. "My name is Mikihara Ariko. Are you a comrade of my father?"

"Your father?" Sora was thrown for a moment, then she nodded.

"Yes, I am," she agreed. "My name is Shiba Sora, and I'm the Vice Captain of the Eighth Division. Mikihara... I mean, Hyakken-dono is my neighbour, and I came to enquire after his health. I know he's been quite ill — but I had hoped to speak to him a while. I didn't mean to intrude, though. I can come back later."

"No... I should go and pay my respects to my Clan Leader," Ariko dimpled, shaking her head. "Guren-sama was kind enough to allow me to be summoned here, and I shouldn't insult that generosity by ignoring my obligations. I have a message to convey from my uncle, in any case. My father is still quite weak, but I am sure you will not over-tax him, will you, Shiba-dono? I have heard how the shinigami have been so attentive to him since his injury, and I am glad he has such supportive comrades. He is fool enough to believe his life is somehow dispensible, but evidently his peers do not agree."

"On the contrary, he's a very brave man and we respect him a good deal," Sora said fervently, somehow flustered by this composed, elegant young woman who seemed so different and alien from the quiet, military Hyakken she had sat next to in Vice Captain meetings for so many years. And yet, despite the delicate prettiness that framed the girl's whole appearance, now she could see the resemblance in the distinctively dark grey eyes and the slight wave to the wisps of hair that had loosed themselves from the ties to frame her face. "If you don't mind, Ariko-dono, I would be obliged to you. I promise I won't tire him out — I understand how ill he still is, and I have no intention of making his healers cross with me."

"Then I shall leave him in your hands and return in an hour or so," Ariko bent to kiss her father gently on the brow, then turned and bowed very properly towards the uniformed shinigami before withdrawing from the chamber. The scent of flowers wafted out of the door behind her, and for a moment Sora simply stared in the direction the girl had gone, transfixed by this highly feminine apparition.

"Sora..dono?"

A soft voice from the bed brought her back to herself, and she swung around, her cheeks pinkening with embarrassment as she met the blurry gaze of her opposite number. "I thought I heard your voice... I had wondered if you might come to see me."

"Hyakken-dono," Sora knelt self-consciously at the bedside, trying to ignore the thick bandages that swathed her companion's arms and upper body beneath the thin fabric of the expensive Clan nightrobes. They were embroidered at the edges with delicate sakura blooms, and suddenly Sora was convinced that Ariko had brought them with her, for they looked so unlike something that Hyakken himself would ever choose. At her expression Hyakken managed a faint smile, moving his mummified right arm stiffly to brush against the edge of the cloth.

"My daughter insists on presenting a good Clan face in all situations," he murmured wryly. "Even, it seems, when you are at the whims of healers and defying death."

“I didn’t know you had a daughter,” Sora said unnecessarily, and Hyakken nodded.

“For all the good I’ve done as her father,” he said reflectively. “My wife died when she was born... she’s lived with my sister most of her life. My sister has daughters, and I know nothing about raising young Clan hime. Well, I’m sure you’re not surprised to hear that. I pay close attention to her life and we have a good relationship, but in some regards our world views do not even begin to touch. I am a soldier, she is a young Clan lady — and there is no changing either thing.”

He shifted his body slightly against his pillows, shooting Sora a grave look.

“Retsu-sama told me, last night, about Anabomi-taichou,” he said soberly. “She said that she wasn’t sure I was ready for the news, but I needed to hear it from her before I heard it through another source. She also told me what the Captains had suggested should happen from this point on. I wondered, then, if you would come here. I confess I’m glad that you have.”

“I didn’t think there was anything else to do but come,” Sora admitted, relief flickering in her green eyes. “I’m glad you know — about both things, because it makes my job easier. Shunsui didn’t give me any warning that he was going to nominate me, so I am still reeling from the idea myself — but last night, I thought it over every which way and I know that it’s something I ought to do. Just, I also knew that there was one person whose views mattered more than mine, and that was yours. When Mitsuki told me yesterday that she’d heard you were coming out of your coma, I didn’t realise how fortunate the timing was. I don’t think I can delay talking to the Captains about my decision for many days — but I did want the chance to talk to you first.”

“What is there to talk about?” Hyakken looked surprised. “You’ve been chosen to be my superior officer. I am a subordinate. It’s not my place to object — especially given the pitiful state in which you find me. On the contrary, I’d rather expect you to find me a significant disappointment — but I’ve been told that I’m not allowed to resign my post, and so it looks like you are stuck with me.”

“Resign? You dare and I’ll come trim your toes off myself,” Sora’s brows knitted together. “Do you have any idea how much that Division adore you? I spent the last few days compiling a report for the Council on what happened in Ninth, and all I got out of your surviving members were their shock and grief at losing their Captain and other officers and their complete fixation with the health of their heroic Vice Captain. They all know you put your life in serious peril to protect them, and those that didn't know have been told so in no uncertain terms by Sakura-chan, whose ability to chat for Seireitei I know well. Your subordinates were constantly disappearing from the barracks to sneak off here, even when they weren't allowed in. Ryuu told me that he'd had to sanction a rota of officers to come and get news on your health, otherwise he'd be facing a mutiny. Do you think I'd be a popular Captain if I walked in there and told them that my first duty as leader was processing your retirement? Don't be stupid. I intend to keep you. I need to keep you. The war is over, so if it takes you time to recover enough to wave your sword, that's fine. I am capable of doing that for both of us for a bit if need be. It's your brain I need. Your knowledge of this squad, it's protocol and everything else I've discovered you apparently do to keep it running. I have no Third Seat, Fourth Seat, Fifth Seat, so there's no way I can spare you. Also, I need you to want to work with me, not simply take it as a Gotei order. I'm not used to working with a Captain who believes in strict military protocol, and I'm not a stiff-backed Kuchiki. I'm a Shiba, we don't work that way... so I need you to be willing to work with me... as... as my partner, not just my subordinate officer. There'll be plenty of others of them. A Vice Captain is different. At least, to me, it is. With Shunsui, it always has been. He trusts me with almost everything regarding the Division, and I would want to do the same with my Vice Captain, as much as I possibly could. It's not a case of 'knowing one's place'. I'm not formal. You already know I don't call Shunsui by any kind of honorific or title. I don't care about any of that, really — the ability to work together and trust each other matters more."

Hyakken's eyes widened slightly, his lips pressing together as he digested this.

"I see," he mused. "I have no experience of how other Divisions operate outside of Ninth. I would say that I had a... as you call it, a partnership with Anabomi-taichou. He was higher born than me, and there was a level of deference between us — but he trusted me and I did all I could not to betray that trust. I don't know if that is the kind of thing you mean?"

"Nor do I," Sora admitted. "This is new to me, just as it is to you. Anabomi was a heck of a Captain and pretty much a God in his own domain around the Ninth. Honestly, I've been terrified to go near the place since I heard what the Captains had decided. His aura is still there. He touched a lot of people within Ninth's marble walls, even if he kept himself to himself outside of it."

"Mm," Hyakken's expression became sad. "The Ninth Division was his life's work, Sora-dono. He had no family left in Sixth District. I remember once he asked about my daughter, and expressed his regret about the fact there was nobody back home for him to write to with news. He was civil with your brother at the Tenth, and of course, deferential towards Guren-sama, but the only close friend I remember him keeping in Seireitei was Kusakawa Shougo-dono. When Shougo-dono died, my Captain became yet more fixed on making Ninth the Division he felt it ought to be. Shougo-dono had believed so strongly in establishing a Twelfth that had independance from its Clan, and so Anabomi-taichou decided to follow the same course of action with Ninth. He knew every member by name, and their circumstances and background. He went to the Academy at least once every three years, and tried to encourage applications from outside of the Kuchiki Clan. He was a phenomenal swordsman, and he took time to train with many of the members individually, offering them tips and encouragement to improve their technique. I am one of those members who had the fortune to work with him frequently in the training arena — but for that, I swear, I would probably not be alive to speak to you now. He was vastly out of my league as a warrior, but at the very least it seems I was enough to prevent him from hurting anyone else.”

“Anabomi didn’t want to hurt anyone,” Sora murmured, and Hyakken nodded.

“I know,” he agreed, and though his voice was even, there was genuine grief in the dark grey eyes. “The exile chose the most evil way possible to kill my Captain. He made him a weapon and used him to slay the people most precious in his life. My only comfort is that it spared him from ever knowing the depth of Shougo-dono’s deceit.”

“You know about that too, huh?”

“It was like a dream, half real and half not,” Hyakken agreed. “I asked Retsu-sama if that had been a hallucination, it seemed so vague and wisplike, but she said not. She explained what had happened. I wish that it had been in time to save the Captain’s life but... Sora-dono... I don’t think it would have saved him. He wouldn’t have ever forgiven himself for killing his men. A Kuchiki who takes his own life is shamed... but I believe he would not have wanted to live with that guilt. Perhaps it was all a mercy it ended how it did... though I would like him to have known, at least, that I was alive and that I — and Ninth — forgive him for what was not his fault.”

“He’s at peace, now,” Sora said honestly. “Hirata told me that his last words were to thank him... it was what he wanted, and he died at peace. His soul will be reborn, Hyakken-dono. Only Ninth can't linger with his ghost forever. Even though I know how deeply you're all grieving... it can't. My oldest brother was hurt in the Real World, and my other brother, I almost had to bring down with my blade, so I won't say there aren't negative emotions for me in this too. Just... Anabomi would be the first person to say that Ninth needed to rally and rise again. I... am not from Ninth, and so I need you to help me make it my home and make your subordinates trust in me to take on that mantle. I am committed to do it, and do it properly. I just need to know you will have me... as your leader, for as long as time demands."

Hyakken offered her a sad smile.

"You already care about the Ninth, because you came here to speak to me in these terms," he said softly. "It would be a foolish Vice Captain who would refuse such genuine emotions. I am a Kuchiki. We are different in many ways from our neighbours in District Five and we, frequently, struggle to adequately express our emotions. I regret that fact, especially now there are men I trained with closely who I will never see again. However, it is as you say. Anabomi-taichou would want Ninth to come back strong. He would accept you as his successor, because you can do what he could not — finally break Ninth Division away from the overlordship of the Kuchiki and establish it in its own right. I know you are not a Shiba in your political views, whatever you are by blood and name. You have served in a foreign Division your entire career... I have no fear of your intentions in coming to mine."

He glanced at his bandaged hands.

"I would shake your hand, but I cannot," he added regretfully. "My left arm I can still barely move, but there is some improvement in my right. Retsu-sama believes she can do more work to improve the damage done to ligaments and tendons, but it will be a long road of physiotherapy before I can use my sword as I should like. Still, you have given me ample reason to persevere. I will be honoured to serve as your Vice Captain, Shiba-taichou. You have my word."

"Well, instead of shaking my hand, you can promise me never to call me that again," Sora flushed red. 'I'm still wearing my Vice Captain badge, and it's not like I've officially given my agreement to Nagesu-sama about this yet. Even when I do, though — my brother, my mother, they are 'Shiba-taichou'. Like you said, I'm not a Shiba Captain, and I don't intend on tying Ninth's loyalties to my Clan. I want to be my own Captain, just like Anabomi did. So you can call me

Sora-dono, if you must — and, of course, ‘Taichou’, but not “Shiba-taichou’. I can’t change my family name, but I don’t have to use it and neither do you.”

“If that’s what you want,” Hyakken smiled ruefully. “I shall try to remember, Sora-dono.”

“Then I should go and speak to Nagesu-sama, and give him my formal acceptance,” Sora got to her feet, letting out her breath in a rush. “I was told not to tire you out, so I’ll leave you to rest — but if you want to speak to me, send a message and I’ll come.”

“I will tell Takaoka, when she comes to visit me this afternoon, that she’s to be your guide in anything in the Division you need to know, and that you have my full backing as our future Captain,” Hyakken told her firmly. “You know her, I know, because she often visits a friend of hers in your Division. She’s also as you will be — someone not of Kuchiki birth who has made Ninth her home. She is a good, competent officer and I have faith that she will help you break the ice with the others. I imagine they will simply be happy to know that things are going to get better... and I will do what I can when I am able to help smooth the transition.”

“I’m glad of that,” Sora dimpled. “I’ll go, then. Ariko-dono was going to see Guren-sama, but she will be back within the hour. I’ll leave you to your peace and quiet and go to Third. Then, I suppose, I’ll go home... and try and get my head around what I’ve just made up my mind to do!”

“Well, I guess you’ll have to do,”

Kirio dropped back against the wall of the chamber with a sigh of resignation, setting the remaining ribbon down onto the unit and folding her arms across her chest as she eyed her companion critically. “You’re still miles too thin, too pale and the smallest size of shihakushou still looks baggy on you — but there’s not a lot I can do about that. Your obi’s long enough for you to hang yourself with if you don’t knot it firmly, and how you’ve managed to fray the thong of your sandal before you’ve even left this room is anyone’s guess... but you do have the sword, and I suppose, that at least makes you look the part.”

“Are you done taking me to pieces, Kirio-san?” Kohaku eyed his reflection in the mirror one last time, then turned to shoot the Sixth Seated officer a look of reproach. ‘Ukitake-dono told you to come help me get ready — not tell me everything that’s wrong with me. I’ve never done this before. I can't help it if I don't know how things work! And as for these,' he kicked at the sandal resentfully, "I've never had to wear them. I didn't have anything on my feet in Rukongai. I didn't know how to properly put them on, and the tabi were making my feet itch. If Ketsui-dono hadn't stopped me, I'd have unlaced it completely... you just stood there and laughed."

"Well, you had such a look of bewilderment on your face I couldn't help it," Kirio admitted. 'Still, you'll do, and you're already late. You've a clean bill of health, and so you can't lurk around here getting any more special treatment, not if you really mean to recruit. Recruits don't get their own private chambers and they certainly don't get to sleep in till all hours,' she gave him a little poke in the arm, "so you'll have to get used to some routine discipline. Are you sure you're still eating like you say you are? I swear you haven't put on a single pound."

"He's eating fine, Kirio-nee," before Kohaku could respond in indignation, the door slid back to reveal Ketsui, an amused expression on his features. "When I lent him those robes for the Council meeting and Nii-chan's trial, the obi was shorter than this one, that's all — he's put on a bit, and he's strong enough to argue with you, so he's doing just fine. Taichou wouldn't let him do anything he wasn't ready for, anyway... and besides, I think he looks fine. The uniform suits you, Kohaku. Don't let her get to you. You're fine."

"Too many fines in one set of sentences makes you sound insincere, Ketsui-kun," Kirio retorted, but Ketsui just offered her a smile.

"I'm a shinigami, not a literary genius," he said calmly, "and besides, it's true. He is fine. Why use another word when fine is, well, fine?"

"I give up," Kirio rolled her eyes. "Besides, this is off the point."

"I've never been a recruit before," Kohaku adjusted the white sash slightly with a frown. "I guess I'm nervous. I don't really know what I'm supposed to do to officially be one. I know that Ukitake-dono... no, no I should say Taichou now, shouldn't I? I know he said he had some paperwork to complete, but other than that... I don't really know."

"Well, you'll soon find out," Ketsui dropped a hand down reassuringly on the young man's shoulders. "Come on. Kirio-nee, I told Taichou I'd take him down to his new accommodation and make sure I handed him over properly to one of his new peers to break in. I've got to find Izumi anyway, since we're doing some training of our own, and apparently you're on Naoko-san's patrol this afternoon."

"I'm what?" Kirio paled, staring at her friend in consternation, and Ketsui nodded.

"Last minute change," he agreed cheerfully. "Kira-san hurt his ankle in the training gym, so Naoko-san said she'd take you instead... I think her exact words were, 'at least I can trust her not to kill herself before we even leave the barracks.'" That's why I came here — to tell you and take over supervising Kohaku in your place. She wants to leave soon, though, so you'd better hurry — I don't think she was in a good mood."

"You could have told me that sooner!" Kirio protested, but nevertheless she grabbed her own sword from where it stood propped against the chamber wall, shoving it through her obi with a sigh. "All right, I guess that's me gone. Good luck, Koku. Knock them dead — but I don't mean that literally, so make sure Kyouka Raigen knows it's not that kind of party. Ketsui, I'll leave him to you."

With that she was gone, scrambling up onto the window-sill and clambering out of the window, and Ketsui tut-tutted, shaking his head slowly.

"Things are always like that in Thirteenth," he said wryly. "You'll get used to it. At first it terrified me, all the manic comings and goings... but now I find it reassuring and, well, like a kind of home. You will too — even if it's nothing like what you've been through before."

"Well, I at least know that people here are kind," Kohaku offered a smile. "Kirio-san and U... Taichou, and you too... but it is very different. I've usually been on my own. I've never shared accommodation with anyone. I've never kept a strict regime. I've never done any kind of real physical training. Whatever I know I know on instinct — things that Kyouka taught me, rather than my working to learn myself. I don't know if I might be useless, Ketsui-dono... but I want to try at least. I want to be able to help people, like Taichou helped me. I think that's the only way I can repay him."

"That makes you no different from the most of us," Ketsui reflected, leading the way out of the small chamber into the hall beyond, then pausing. "Hey, do you have all your belongings? You won't come back to this room again. Technically it belongs to the Division's Fourth Seat, only ours died two years ago, and the position's been empty since. That's why you were able to use it — but as a recruit, you'll be sharing with the others. Izumi is different, she gets to share with higher seated officers because she's the only girl recruit — but you won't have any special favours as regards accommodation."

"I don't want any special favours at all," Kohaku assured his companion firmly, moving to close the door behind him. 'And I... I don't have any belongings. Only Kyouka Raigen, who's here,' he patted his waist self-consciously. "Taichou said I wasn't allowed to draw it, and that he might not let me keep it in my new room with my roommates there, not until I can use it better... but today, he said I should have it, so really that's all that's mine. Even the books..." he looked wistful, then shrugged. "My books are still in Rukongai," he owned. "They're tatty and old, so nobody would steal them, but I can't go get them. All the ones here belong to the Thirteenth. I've nothing else to bring. Just me."

"Well, travelling light is a good military habit," Ketsui reflected. "One word of advice, though. Being a shinigami means that your room and board is essentially part of your stipend — but you will have your own money, too. Don't do as some do and go crazy the first time someone gives you coin, all right? There's not much you really need to buy if you live in Inner Seireitei, so it's a good idea to keep that for a rainy day. You never know when you might need it, especially as you have nobody else to rely on but yourself. It's not a fortune, and it can vanish really quickly if you're not careful in how you manage it."

"Money?" Kohaku stopped, looking blank, and Ketsui arched an eyebrow.

"You hadn't realised? Shinigami do get paid, you know — although our accommodation and food ration is deducted from what we actually get, it's a proper form of employment. A lot of shinigami send home money to their families in the Districts. I think Taichou is one, actually... and Ten-nii certainly paid for a lot of Mother's medicine when he was a recruit, which was a godsend when she was really sick. We'd never have managed otherwise, because I was still a student and Mother was too ill to work in the last year of her life."

"I hadn't thought about it," Kohaku admitted honestly. "There's no money in the part of the Rukon I was living in. I don't know if I've ever even seen any. Father may have had some — but he never needed to discuss it with me, and if he did, I don't know where he got it or how. I never left the village, not till I came here with Souja-dono. I had no need of it, so the subject never came up."

"In that case, really don't let it go to your head," Ketsui said firmly. "Talk to Taichou or Fukutaichou about it. They'll help you work out what to do with it while you decide what you need to buy."

“All right,” Kohaku agreed. “Thank you for the advice, Ketsui-dono. Although...”

“Although?”

“If I can, I might... like to buy a book,” Kohaku went red. “I know it sounds silly, but... I suppose they’re the only things I’ve ever really owned. Tatty and wrecked as my books are, they’re the one thing I really miss from Rukongai. The ones Kirio-san found for me in the Thirteenth archive were new and different and made reading something fresh and exciting. Before, I always used reading as a way to calm down when my spirit power was overloading — reading the same pages in the same order was reassuring and so I guess I made a habit of it. Reading here was different, though, and it made me want to know what other books people write. I realised there are probably lots of books I’ve never read, and so... well... if you can buy them, then maybe I’ll buy some of those.”

“Well, you can if you like,” Ketsui was amused. “Given the stipulations the Council put on Taichou regarding you and Izumi both, I think you’ll find you end up with more reading to do than you know what to do with. I’m sure I saw a couple of familiar Academy textbooks lying out on Taichou’s desk when I spoke to him last. Before you buy something, though, I suggest you get someone to take you to the Archive first. Both the Division’s and the main Archive... you’ll find more books there than you can read in three lifetimes, I guarantee it.”

Kohaku’s eyes became huge, and Ketsui laughed, patting him on the back.

“For now, though, we’re getting ahead of ourselves,” he said warmly. “I’m happy you’re staying, because it means I can repay the debt my brother owes you for the help you gave at his trial, but also because I think it will be interesting to have you here. Besides, your father and mine, they were close. Whatever I think about the politics of either, I don’t think it’s a bad thing if their children forge some kind of working relationship. I’m already helping Izumi with her sword, and she’s completely hopeless, although at least now she’s actually trying. Since you have Kyouka Raigen, I’m sure you can’t be as bad, and I’m willing to extend my help to you too in that regard. I’m not bad with a sword, so it occurred to me that’s one way I could. Izumi would like it too, to have someone else taking some of the heat off her, and well, I’m a Tenth Seat. Apparently that means I’m supposed to help recruits. It’s part of my job.”

He looked sheepish.

“You know, till recently I would have balked and run at the idea of that,” he admitted self-effacingly. “But, in light of all that we’ve been through lately, and the things you’ve overcome to get to this point, I guess I’ve been overly cautious. It’s my duty and I’m not going to run away from it, either. We should share our skills... doing that is how we get stronger. Though don’t ask me about kidou. More to the point, don’t ask Shizuka about my kidou, either, because she’ll tell you a list of humiliating horror stories from our time at the Academy. Tsunemori-san is the best kidou user in the Division after the Captain, but he’s often busy because of it, so keep that in mind.”

“I have a lot to remember,” Kohaku groaned, rubbing his brow, and Ketsui nodded.

“For now, though, the names of your fellows will suffice,” he said frankly, as they turned the next corner and he rapped sharply on the final door of the very end chamber. “Kayashima! If you’re there, get out here now! I know you were on midnight patrol last night, but Taichou says you’re to take charge of our newest recruit, so you’d better be dressed and ready!”

“Ketsui-san!” The door slid back to reveal a young man of about Kohaku’s own age, and suddenly Kohaku felt shy, fighting against the urge to withdraw into the safety of Ketsui’s slipstream at this stranger’s sudden curiosity. “I’m here, and I’m awake, I promise. I’m the only one who is now, though. Everyone else is on patrol with Atsudane-san or Shikibu-san. Atsudane-san left me behind because he said that Taichou had an errand for me — is this it?”

“This is it,” Ketsui agreed, grabbing Kohaku by the arm and hauling him forward. ‘Your errand. Aizen Kohaku, meet Kayashima Eiji. He’s your senpai and your fellow recruit — also one of your new roommates. You will spend a lot of time together, so resolve between the pair of you not to start any die-hard rivalries or feuds, all right? Kayashima’s been a recruit since the spring,’ he added, glancing at Kohaku. “He’s been here long enough to know the ropes, so I’ll leave him to initiate you.” He offered the bewildered youngster a smile, then turned his attention to the interested Kayashima. “Taichou wants to see the both of you in an hour, Kayashima, so make sure Kohaku’s seen everything he needs to by the time you take him to Ugendou. And don’t be late, because Fukutaichou wants you for late patrol again.”

“Yes, sir,” Kayashima nodded smartly. “I won’t be. I’ll do as you say.”

“Good. Then have you seen Izumi? I mean, Ichimaru-san?”

“No, but she might have gone to Seventh,” Kayashima scratched his head. “I think her brother is leaving, so Fukutaichou gave her permission to go see him off.”

“Great,” Ketsui grimaced, then nodded. “All right. I’ll take it up with him, then. Kohaku, stick with Kayashima. He’ll see you right. I have to go find my runaway recruit.” And with that he was gone, disappearing into a whoosh of reiatsu, and Kohaku sighed, shaking his head.

“I’ll never be able to do that,” he murmured, more than half to himself, but Kayashima overheard, and he let out a snort.

“Don’t be dumb,” he said disparagingly. “All shinigami worth their salt can shunpo. You’ll learn it. We all do.”

“Huh?” Kohaku started, staring at his companion disconcertedly, and Kayashima sighed, grasping him by the wrist and pulling him into the small chamber.

“Here,” he said matter of factly, gesturing around him. “This is home for you now till you get promoted and moved on out — which, judging by the fact everyone already knows your name and a ton of crazy stuff about you, will probably happen sooner than you think. When I signed up, they told me that right now Taichou likes to keep recruits unseated for a year or two, to build experience and harden off from the Academy. I’m the only from this year’s grad class — well, till Ichimaru-san came, but she’s a special case, like you. The others were all leftovers from last year’s class who didn’t get seated yet, and I’ll bet they don’t know more’n I do, because I can spar any of them just fine. Anyhow, for however long you remain unseated, this is where the recruits live, so this is where you will, too. It’s small and simple but cosy and it’s warmer when there’s a frost if there are more people in the room. Normally it can sleep six, but you’re the fifth male recruit, so you can choose whether you have this bunk or that one,” he pointed across the room, “which is closer to the window but, apparently, damn cold when the sun’s not out. This one is better, but it’s right by mine, so — you don’t snore, I hope?”

“I...” Kohaku blinked, and Kayashima grinned, pushing him down onto the aforementioned empty bunk and then sitting down on the one opposite, crossing his legs and leaning back against the wall.

“Blankets and stuff we can get from store,” he reflected. “I guess you don’t have any of your own stuff, but it’s all right, because I didn’t either, not that kind of thing, and there’s a whole room full of spares just in case. I’ll ask someone later, when Taichou’s done with us, I guess. Fukutaichou should be able to sign some out for you, when I explain what it's for — or if not him, I think Atsudane-san has clearance, too. They're our best bet — they're less finicky about the rules and they're more likely to be easy on you and let you take more because you're new. I know you were in the Fourth Seat chamber before, but you'll need your own allocation of supplies now, so everything's on proper record if you need something replaced. One of the others managed to put his foot clean through a blanket the other week practicing what he claims were Hakuda moves on his bunk... it wasn't pretty, I'll tell you, watching him try to persuade the Powers That Be that he was entitled to a new one."

His grin widened at Kohaku's obvious bewilderment.

"It's all right, you know," he continued evenly. "We know, all of us, about your Pa. It'd be impossible not to. But it's not a big deal to me, and it won't be to the others, either. Taichou trusts you, and that's enough round these parts. Besides..." He shrugged. "We can't choose our family. Lord knows it would be a better world if sometimes we could, but there it is."

"What do you mean?" Despite himself, Kohaku stared, and Kayashima's expression became pensive.

"Well, let's just say the detailed version is a story for another day," he reflected, "but my old man was never much fun, either. Criminal record as long as both my arms and my legs, and partial to drunken brawls. Thirteenth's the first place I've been where it hasn't mattered, though. Even at the Academy, sometimes his reputation would get me hassle with the Clansfolk. Not here, though. Thirteenth is different. They accept people. Taichou makes sure of it. No matter who you were or where you came from, the moment you put on our uniform you're one of us. That's what Fukutaichou told me when I first came here, and now I'm telling you. Since I'm senpai, I figure I should make sure you know the important things from the off."

He scratched his head, looking rueful.

"Though, aside from Ichimaru-san, you're the first new recruit since me, and like I said, Ichimaru-san is different," he admitted. "She's a girl, to begin with, and I haven't spent much time with her, if I'm honest. I hope it'll be different with you, though. I mean, we're roommates now, and I hope we'll be friends. It's better that way — and you look like you need friends. You look scared of your own shadow, actually — but I've heard about that sword of yours, and so I'm pretty sure you'll settle and be fine once you realise nobody here hates you for things your Pa did."

“Kayashima-san...” Kohaku faltered, then a faint smile touched his features and he bowed his head. “Thank you. I appreciate that. Please, tell me everything Ketsui-dono asked you to, and I’ll try to remember. I want to be like everyone else, and I don’t want to do anything I shouldn’t.”

“No more formality!” Kayashima scolded, swiping his companion lightly across the head and making him jerk it up in dismay. “We’re both recruits. I’m senpai, but I’m sure I just told you I wanted us to be friends. None of this formal language nonsense, like I’m years older than you. I’m sure I’m not. I’m only twenty one, and you can’t be younger than that, surely?”

“I’m the same age,” Kohaku admitted, a little dazed, and Kayashima nodded approvingly.

“Good, then that settles it,” he said firmly, standing and dragging Kohaku to his feet. “We’ll be friends. The other guys are a year or two older than I am and have been here longer, so they rip on me sometimes for it, though they’re all right, really. You’re my age though, so we’ll stick together. I’ll teach you all the things you ought to know about the Division and Inner Seireitei — and the things that you need to know that only come with experience, too.’ His eyes twinkled with mischief. “Like the best places to spend free hours, and the Divisions with the prettiest girls, and how to get the best seat in the food-hall and the best rations. And... most important of all... how to escape being on Shikibu-san’s dawn patrol.”

He shivered.

“I don’t know if you’ve met her, but Shikibu-san is strict,” he added confidentially. “She’s a great shinigami, and a great trainer, but first thing in the morning she’s a holy terror and impatient as hell. Going on dawn patrol with her is about the same as taking a trip into the Gates of Hell before the sun’s properly up, and it’s not a great start to any day once you’ve been lashed by her tongue a few times for falling behind.”

Kohaku stared, then he began to laugh.

“What’s so funny?” Kayashima looked suspicious, and Kohaku shook his head, holding up his hands in apology.

“Ketsui-dono said things were always a little bit crazy here,” he explained. “He said it would take me time to get used to, and it will. But... well, I was just thinking that... maybe it won’t take as much time as I thought. Maybe I will enjoy it. All of it.”

“Well, it’s easier to do a good job if you’re having fun, right?” Kayashima’s face cleared and he grinned unrepentantly. “Come on. I’ll show you the baths and the rota, so you know when recruits are allowed to use it without being trampled by sweaty senior officers... by which I mean Fukutaichou. Then I’ll take you to the mess hall. We’ve only an hour, so I don’t know if I’ll have time to show you anything else before I take you to Taichou, but there’s always tomorrow, after drill. That is, so long as you can keep up with us.”

“I’m here to stay, now.” Kohaku nodded firmly. “Whatever it brings, this is where I ought to be. I saw myself in the shihakushou just now, and I realised that I was seeing myself for the first time. This is my future... now it’s just for me to figure out how best to live it.”

The forests of District Seven had changed little in the time since he had last been here, and, as Joumei picked his way through the thick foliage, he observed absently that even some of the most hidden signposts that had guided the Kitsune in this overgrown paradise had begun to disappear into the undergrowth, as though the trees and ferns were trying to reclaim the area for their own. Insects buzzed close to the ground, looking for the blooms that unfurled their petals only in the deepest gloom, and as he walked beneath the heavy canopy, a heavy feeling settled over Joumei’s heart.

This would be the last time he would come here. His fingers slipped to the sash of his robe, fingering the handle of the shovel he had borrowed from the Seventh Division before he had left Inner Seireitei to conduct his final act of respect towards the family he had loved and lost. There was no longer a need for the Kitsune to live underground, or, he mused regretfully, to call themselves by that name. The work that his father had begun had laid the groundwork and Joumei’s own policies of integration had allowed most of the fit and healthy lesser members of the conclave to branch out and mingle in Seireitei communities with other ordinary folk. Now that he had met Nagesu face to face, Joumei was confident that, even if they strayed into District Three, there would be no danger of retribution on their heads.

Leaping nimbly over a jutted out tree root, Joumei paused to sweep back a particularly heavy layer of leaves and grass, brushing the earth beneath it clear until he could make out the worn surface of the stone that, so many years earlier, Keitarou had carved the character for “friend” into. For a moment he hesitated, then he placed his palm against the stone, pressing his skin down against the character until he had completely covered it from view and closing his eyes.

Thank you, Daisuke-sama. I never got to meet you myself, nor speak to you about your motives, but I thank you for them all the same. Father told me that you believed we were all victims, and that there should be no separation of kin. We were all Urahara, and it seems, we still are. People like Keitarou strove to keep us all divided, but now I've met the head of the Urahara, I know that that fortune changes with each generation. Like you could not choose the era you lived in, nor can my people trust me to be the same solid leader my father was. I've made mistakes and people have paid for those with their lives. However, I don't think that I've made one in trusting my sister's life and happiness to your younger son.

A faint smile touched his lips, and he opened his eyes, gazing around him with fresh appreciation for the peaceful solitude of the glen.

Keitarou chose this place for you because he loved you, and wanted you to rest in a suitable location, in peace at last.

Slowly he got to his feet, dusting the leaf litter from his hands.

A proper Urahara burial, even though both you and he had walked far from that line. I told your son, Daisuke-sama, that if he ever wanted to come here, I'd happily help him to find the place. So would Izumi — but he's not ready yet. Keitarou's crimes are still too fresh, and so are his brother's actions — but in time, maybe, he'll come. I don't know if I believe that your spirit still lingers in this place — but if it's waiting for Ketsui-dono, I'm sure that, one day, he'll come. Just like Tenichi-dono did — to pay his respects to the father whose actions, ultimately, allowed my sister and I to live. I wonder if you could have known, then, that one day your son would fall in love with one of our people, and that the family would, bit by bit, begin to mend.

He nudged the ferns back over the stone with the toe of his sandal, his expression becoming bittersweet.

She won't admit it clearly yet, and nor will he — but I see it, between them. Like mother and father... there's only one way it will end. Letting go of Izumi was the hardest thing I had to do, but it's for her own sake, and sometimes, I'll come by and make sure she's doing well. In the meantime, my obligation is to Hirata-sama, to repay him the debts I've incurred on my own account. Souja-dono is no longer here, but I am, and I'll work twice as hard to ensure that District Seven remains at peace for as long as I'm able.

He turned his back on the grave, ducking beneath the heavy branches of a nearby tree and making his way carefully through the greenery to the concealed opening of the mine. He had not been back here since the night of his escape, and, even after Keitarou's death he had delayed coming, telling himself that there were still things in Inner Seireitei for him to take care of. Now, though, he knew he could put it off no longer. It had been hard to say goodbye to Izumi, and, he realised, he had regretted his departure from Seventh Division, for he had come to understand why Souja had held the place in so much esteem. Still, that was not his path. His people were gone and, once he had seen to the final burial of his dead kin in the maze underground, his duty was to return to the heart of District Seven and the Clan manor. Misashi would be waiting for him, he knew, and, as his life was no longer in constant danger from Urahara reprisals, his journey there should be an uneventful one.

So long, of course, as he did not cross tracks with Keitarou's oldest son, whose whereabouts were still unknown. Their last encounter still made Joumei uneasy about what might happen the next time they met — for though it seemed that Katsura had wiped the shinigami off his hit list, the killer of his sister was another matter.

Well, and we all find justice for our crimes eventually, one way or another. If that's my path, I'll walk it. If we meet again, Katsura-dono, then perhaps one thing may be settled, even if only one of us walks away from the encounter alive. I have honed my skills with Kikyue-hime's help, and I will fight for my life, even if that means taking yours. Izumi isn't in danger and I have nobody else to protect — so if we meet again, perhaps that ghost will also be laid to rest.

The tunnels were as he remembered them, and dust had settled in the entrance, indicating that nobody had been here since the altercation with Keitarou had broken the mine's sanctuary once and for all. Keitarou himself had clearly paid it no further interest once his prey had managed to escape, and as he turned and descended into the walkways he had known from his early childhood, he found a hollow sense of emptiness begin to gnaw away at him. It was not simply the Sekkiseki that made this place empty now, he realised with a jolt, but the fact it was no longer a home, and they were no longer a family. Keitarou succeeded in destroying the Kitsune, but not in the way he imagined.

Letting out a sigh, Joumei lowered his head to step into the chamber in which the corpses of his sickly kinsfolk still lay. Though it had been some time since they had died, the aura of Sekkiseki had helped to stay their spiritual decomposition, and so they appeared frozen in time, no longer of this world but not yet belonging to the next. It would take a little time to bury them alone, he realised, but nonetheless he did not want help. Their burial was his last duty as their leader, and he would not shirk from completing it in person.

Before he did, though, there was one other place he needed to go and one other thing he needed to see through.

Leaving the chamber behind him with a silent promise to his dead kin that he had not abandoned them a second time, he headed deeper into the bowels of the mine, pausing to draw breath as he reached the area where the Sekkiseki seams remained at their strongest. He had been in Inner Seireitei too long, he realised grimly, for sweat was beading his brow as his body protested from the sudden exposure, but he pressed on, determined not to turn back. It seemed a lifetime before he reached the chamber with the collapsed in ceiling, and though the dust and stone had settled, the whole area surrounding the door was blocked by heavy layers of rock. He was still very close to the Sekkiseki seam here, but on examining the fallen ceiling rock, he realised with relief that it was mostly ordinary stone, and therefore susceptible to spiritual magic. Hiko had brought it down on top of himself, he remembered grimly, and, now he was no longer under Keitarou's control, surely a second blast of Shakkahou would shift enough for him to be able to enter the chamber and retrieve his friend's corpse.

Hiko had not been a Kitsune, nor even a blood Urahara, but it didn't matter. Like Souja, he had been a valued ally, and, like Souja, Joumei wanted to ensure the man's spirit was allowed to rest in peace.

He closed his eyes, taking a deep breath to steady himself as he attempted to draw together what fragments of spirit power he could muster in the heavy, toxic atmosphere. Still, hard as it was, it also gave him a sense of relief. If, after just a short time away from the mine, his resistance to Sekkiseki could falter this much, then, perhaps, there was hope for Izumi to live a normal life without fear of developing the terrible wasting sickness that had killed their father, their grandfather and so many of their other kin.

At his third attempt, he managed to draw enough reiryoku together to fire one spell and, though it was raw and rough around the edges, it illuminated the whole cavern like a beacon, cannoning into the rock at close range. Joumei had aimed it perfectly for the rock's natural weak spot, and, as a result, fragments of stone went flying in all directions, causing him to drop to the ground and cover his head to protect it from flying shrapnel. The corridor was thick with Sekkiseki dust, and Joumei coughed violently, feeling nauseated as the heavy substance infiltrated his lungs and pricked against his throat. It took a moment for the cloud to clear, but, as it did, Joumei could see the chamber proper for the first time. Steeling himself to find his friend's crushed corpse, he scrambled to his feet, clambering over what was left of the wreckage and then stopping dead, gripping hold of the rock more tightly between his fingers as he struggled to process what lay before him.

“Hiko?”

Although the ceiling had fallen, the majority of the chamber had remained undamaged, and though it was now cluttered with debris from Joumei’s explosion, it was far less damaged than he had originally expected based on Hiko’s spell. The chamber had once held a number of stored implements, weapons collected by Joumei’s father and other tools that had been used for one task or another over the years, and it was clear that the explosion had disturbed these, sending a few of them scattering across the ground. More importantly, however, although he could make out the dark shadow of blood against the stone, there was absolutely no sign of a corpse.

“Hiko!”

Suddenly galvanised into life, Joumei half climbed, half fell into the chamber, hurrying to the patch of blood and touching the edges of it with his fingers, watching as it flaked away against his skin. It had completely dried, yet as he scanned his surroundings for any sign of what had happened to his companion’s corpse, he made out another, smaller patch a short distance away. He shuffled over towards it, and as he did so, he saw another, then another, and another. A slow trail of stains led across the chamber, some smeared, some in droplets, as though something dripping blood had been carried through room from one side to the other. Heart now pounding in his chest, Joumei followed the trail until it reached the back wall, pressing his hands against the stone.

Hiko, where are you? Did Keitarou come back and take you? What did he do with you?

Helplessness washed over him, and he sank down onto the ground, tears pricking at the back of his eyes.

If it wasn’t bad enough that you threw yourself away for me, did that man come back and abuse your body further?

Just as he felt that his grief and the cave’s oppressive atmosphere would overwhelm him, he caught sight of one section of wall that did not look quite as it should. Moving closer to it, he explored it cautiously with his fingers, taking in the broken edges. More importantly, however, as he drew nearer he could make out distinctive bloody fingerprints, smeared with what was unmistakeably the charcoal residue of firing a powerful flame spell. For a moment

Joumei's heart stopped, his eyes opening wide with disbelief and sudden, incredulous hope.

Pulling the shovel from his waistband, he began to hack furiously at the rock from every angle he could possibly conceive, trying desperately to pry it away from the wall. It was hard work and he was tiring, fatigued already by the drain on his reiryoku, but at length the sharp metal of the spade and his determination won through, the rock cracking and crumbling away beneath his gaze.

Behind there was a hole. It was a crude one, as though it had been blasted open with some kind of spell and then the rest had been physically whacked through, but as he gazed at it, Joumei's sluggish heart suddenly began to palpitate in his chest. On the rough edges of the hole were further signs of bloody splatter. Inside the tunnel, discarded but covered with the same bloody prints were the mangled remains of two old swords and a halberd, the handles cracked and the edges blunted as though they had been used to force a way through. Joumei was enough of a scientist to understand the evidence that lay in front of him. Had Hiko been dragged from here dead, the blood would have smeared the floor and passage, but there was no sign of this. Dazed and reeling, he clung to the only other explanation that he had.

Hiko had not died in the explosion.

Hiko had left the cave, wounded but able enough to force a tunnel through to one of the old, disused exits that only a Kitsune would ever know how to find or navigate to the surface, backfilling his excavation to cover his tracks.

Following the trail down the tunnel, Joumei became ever more convinced that his hypothesis was correct. There was no sign of a body, just the discarded blade that Hiko had used to stab himself with Sekkiseki dust before diving into the chamber and firing the spell.

Hiko was still alive.

Joumei fell back against the tunnel wall, the tears falling unbidden as he processed this.

But why, then, would you not come to Inner Seireitei? Why would you leave and not tell me? Why would you do that, Hiko, if you were all right? You must know how we felt... you must know we'd want to know.

And then, in a flash, he understood, his relief replaced by a cold sense of reality.

Keitarou made sure you got out of the way of the explosion. Keitarou prevented you from killing yourself. Keitarou made you escape the danger... probably because he felt that he could use you in some way later in order to get to me. You're not here, so either he didn't leave you here to ambush me, or when he died, the immediate control over you waned enough for you to follow your own will. But Keitarou's power of possession doesn't break by itself. Killing him doesn't free you from what he did to either of us. Kohaku saved me, but he didn't save you. None of us knew you were still alive, and none of us could do anything to help you. The orders he left with you, they remain. Hirata-sama was quite clear about that when talking about Ohara-dono, before he knew what Kohaku could do to help.

He closed his eyes, clenching his fists in anger and frustration.

If you left here on your own, then probably, you returned to your senses enough to make that decision. Probably, too, you understood what Keitarou's curse meant. Maybe he told you there was no escape from it — who knows what poison he pumped into your brain after I left this place. Maybe he still knew where you were, right up till he died — but he was only interested in me, and so let you run, in case he needed a later back-up plan to deal with me. You told me you wouldn't ever hurt me, and you're smart enough to have figured out what it's taken me this long to know. You don't know about Kohaku, or that there's a way to break Keitarou's spell. You only know that you promised me you wouldn't hurt me... and you're keeping that promise by staying away. If Keitarou ordered you not to kill yourself, then you won't be able to escape his curse that way. And if we ever meet, you'll try to kill me. Even if you've returned to rationality in all other respects, those orders will remain unless Kohaku is able to remove them... and I have no way of knowing where you even are.

He opened his eyes once more, new resolution burning in them.

I will find you, Hiko. Even if it's dangerous, I will. Even if you try to hurt me, I won't just abandon you. If you're alive out there, then I'll find you, and then, I'll go to Seireitei and beg Kohaku to heal you. I promise, no matter what, I will. I couldn't do anything for Souja-dono except kill his killer — but in your case, if it takes the rest of my life or even costs me it, I will find you. Being with the Kitsune damaged your life irrevocably — at the very least, I want to try to give some of it back.

79. Epilogue: To Stand Upon The Heavens

EPILOGUE To Stand Upon The Heavens

“Enter, Shiba Sora.”

The big heavy doors of the Captain’s Chamber swung back to reveal the long hallway within and Sora gathered her courage, clenching and unclenching her fists beneath the sleeves of her dark shihakushou. It would not do to falter now, on the biggest of stages, yet her heart was beating a mile a minute and Hotarue’s skittish excitement was doing nothing to calm her nerves.

Her room at Eighth had been all but cleared, and, as she had got ready that morning, it had been with a sense of bittersweet nostalgia that it would be the last time she would awaken within these four walls. Mitsuki and Naoko had appeared to help her with her haori and her apprehension, but, by the time Shunsui had poked his head around the door of the Vice Captain’s office to tell her that the summons had come, they had long since departed to attend to their own duties. She had been glad to see him, and at the sight of her, he had offered her a grin of approval.

“It will be strange, staring at you in the Captain’s hall instead of Anabomi,” he had reflected, and Sora had detected the genuine sadness in her friend’s dark eyes as he had surveyed her, “but you look the part, now, Sora-chan. Ninth need to know how lucky they are, getting such a well trained officer to lead them.”

At that point he had winked, and the momentary melancholy had all but gone from his expression.

“Remember, you’re representing Eighth Division going into this,” he had bantered, “so if you trip up or fall over your feet, I won’t forgive you.”

At his light-hearted words, Sora had felt tears pricking in her own eyes and, unashamedly, she had hugged him, dislodging the pink haori from his shoulders to reveal the newly restored white one that lay beneath “Hey, what’s all this?” he had been taken off guard at her sudden show of emotion, but Sora had not cared.

“I’m just grateful to finally get out from under your paperwork and your hangovers,” she had bantered back, meeting his gaze with a warm one of her own. “I hope you’ve told Tetsu what to expect when he tries to enter your office — I’d hate to think you’d sold him my seat under false pretences.”

“Ah, well, Tetsuya has worked with me as long as you have, pretty much, so there’s no concealing the fact that I’m lazy and incompetent at best,” Shunsui had held her at arm’s length, amusement glittering in his own expression. “He’s a brave lad, though, and he’s agreed to take it on. We’ll be fine, and he’s said that, if it all gets to much for him, he’ll run to claim sanctuary at the Ninth.”

“Sensible man,” Sora had laughed, stepping back and smoothing down her haori once more, glancing at the office’s small mirror to make sure she was still presentable and that none of her dark curls had come loose from the ribbon in which she had confined them. “All right, I suppose I’m as ready as I ought to be. Go on, Shunsui. You shouldn’t be late on my account. I know where I’m going and I’ll follow right behind you — but from today, I’m not your subordinate any more. I’m your equal and I have to stand on my own two feet, no matter how scared I’m feeling — otherwise Ninth will never have confidence in me to rebuild all the damage Keitarou’s done.”

“They’d be fools if they didn’t, but I suppose you’re right,” Shunsui had pursed his lips, but he had nodded. “I’ll see you there, then. Remember, Juushirou, Hirata and I — we’re all your allies, and we’ll help you through, if you need it, the first few weeks. Standing on your own two feet is all very well, but the Gotei would be much more successful if it put pride and rivalries aside and worked cohesively, so don’t forget that asking us for advice isn’t abusing your rank. In this regard, we’re your senpai — and we’re always here to back you up, whatever we might say to you behind closed doors.”

“Thanks, Shunsui. I’ll remember that,” Sora’s eyes had shone with gratitude at this, and Shunsui had offered her a parting wink before disappearing from the office altogether. A moment later she had heard him give instructions to Shindou, before crossing the threshold and leaving Eighth’s compound completely, and she had taken a deep breath, summoning all her courage to make the short walk to the Gotei Captain’s hall.

Now, she was standing before that very door that, for so many years, she had waited impatiently outside, and, for the first time, it had opened to admit her as one of them.

Remembering Shunsui’s words about tripping up, she made her way slowly and properly into the chamber, trying to ignore the Captains that flanked her on either side. Nagesu stood at the head of the room, his own uniform impeccable and his expression composed and grave as befitted the occasion. The room was so silent that you could've heard a pin drop, and Sora swallowed hard, then dropped down onto her knees, bowing her head low before the representative Captain who currently held sway over the rest.

"Shiba Sora, presenting for duty," she murmured, and Nagesu bent to touch her on the shoulder.

"Shiba Sora, you understand the will of the Captains in summoning you here today?"

"Yes, sir, I do."

"And you accept the responsibility conveyed upon you by your fellow officers, to lead and serve the Ninth Division from this point? You understand that this duty is a heavy one undertaken until such time that you are no longer able, even if that be till the end of your natural life?"

"Yes, sir. I understand, and I accept the burden of that responsibility."

"Then stand, Shiba Sora, Captain of the Ninth Division. From this point on you are one of us, and you should join the ranks as the others have before you."

Gingerly Sora stood, blinking at Nagesu for a moment, and the Head of the Third Division offered her a smile, extending an arm to gesture to the vacant space between Hirata of the Seventh and Atsushi of the Eleventh. Turning, she met Hirata's gaze, and something in the pale depths of her old friend's eyes helped to steady her nerves slightly. She made no comment, merely lowering her head in acceptance of the instruction, before making her way carefully and as demurely as she could muster to the side of the chamber, taking her position with an inward sigh of relief. On her right, Atsushi made no attempt to meet her gaze, but this rebuff was quickly forgotten as she registered Shunsui standing directly across from her.

So that was what you meant, when you said you'd be staring at me instead of Anabomi.

Despite her nerves, Sora's lips twitched into a genuine smile, and Shunsui's eyes twinkled.

Though I'll be all right, Shunsui. You've put me in this position, but I'll rise to the occasion and prove you weren't mistaken. I won't let them think that a Shiba who trained in a foreign Division is in any way lacking. I'm a woman going into a Kuchiki Division to lead, and a foreign Clanswoman at that. There will have to be lots of changes, but sometimes that can be good. I've not had as much opportunity as I would've liked to visit the Ninth and meet its members, but after this, I will work hard to do what Anabomi did and know them all completely. I will make them accept me and move forward — both for the Gotei and for Ninth.

“Now that we have a full compliment of Captains again, Nagesu-sama, may I raise the question of when we can officially inaugurate replacement Vice Captains?” Shunsui turned his gaze to the front of the chamber. “Kitabata Hajime has been assessed under the new criteria for promoting adjutants, I believe, but I'd heard Hirata hadn't formally been given authority to award the badge. I'm waiting on similar clearance to present the Vice Captain's badge to my current Third Seated officer, Shindou Tetsuya — he's accepted and, as I understand it, also been passed as a candidate for promotion. This new system of testing suitability is all very well, but if it leaves squads without key officers, maybe it needs a proverbial kick up the rear.”

“There's something ironic about it being you talking about kicking anything up the rear, Shunsui,” as Sora tried to process the sudden shift in atmosphere from oppressively solemn and formal to a casual banter, Kyouki let out a chuckle of amusement. “I do second your point, though. Midori-dono and I ratified Shindou's suitability, and I believe that Guren-sama and Ukitake have done the same for Kitabata. Surely we can officially accept them into their new posts, if we can manage to prepare a haori to fit my daughter in time for this morning's ceremony?”

“I apologise. It's as you say, with so many things to arrange, final clearance hasn't been authorised, but it's another duty that the Captain Commander will simply have to see to more quickly, even among his Clan duties,” Nagesu acknowledged good-naturedly. “Hirata-dono, Shunsui-dono, you may inform your officers that their promotions have been accepted and ratified and you may award them their badges. From this point on they are Vice Captains of their respective Divisions.”

“Sora, what about Mikihara?” Hakubei cast his sister a quizzical look. “I know that he's been formally discharged from the Fourth, but I was under the impression that he wasn't physically fit to return to duty yet. I'd heard from the members of Ninth that he was going to go convalesce in Sixth District for a while — was that wrong?”

“I've been in close communication with him since it was agreed that I'd take on this," Sora touched the haori self-consciously, pinkening slightly at being so suddenly under scrutiny. "We've discussed many things relating to the squad, and I've no intention of replacing him, even if I had a candidate of my own. There's nobody who knows Ninth better or cares about it more, and considering what the squad has been through, I want to have someone like that working with me if at all possible. I know that he's undertaking physiotherapy for his arm wounds — Retsu-sama can probably tell you more than me about how long that will take, though."

"It will take time, though Hyakken-dono is determined to regain his fitness and that is a help," Retsu reflected thoughtfully. "I believe your Vice Captain may take a year, perhaps longer before he can adequately raise a sword in the way he did before. However, we can hope that Soul Society has entered a period of peace. I think Sora-dono's assessment of the situation is a logical one, Hakubei-dono. Ninth Division need some stability, and Hyakken-dono is well-placed to ease the transition between the old regime and a new one."

"As for his convalescence, his daughter wants to take him, but he's resisting it thus far," Sora added ruefully. "He says that his place is here and there's nothing he can do in Sixth District that's of any use, whereas here he can at least be involved, even if he can't train or fight. He's quite obstinate in that regard. The better I come to understand him, I think that sending him to Sixth District to do nothing would hurt both his pride and his recovery. He's a soldier first and foremost, and I'm certain that he considers Ninth Division his real home. I'll keep him here and work with him, but I've told him that it's on the condition that he follows Retsu-sama's instructions and doesn't try to over-tax himself. If he does, I'll send him to his daughter myself."

"It sounds as though you have my kinsman's measure quite nicely," Guren remarked. "He's as you say, a soldier before anything else. I suppose it's an advantage, having worked as Vice Captains together. You're acquainted and so know a little of each other's methods."

"On the contrary, we had little involvement with each other until recently. We attended the same meetings, but I wouldn't say we were well acquainted," Sora shook her head. "I'm coming to know him now, though. I believe we'll work fine together, Guren-sama. Shunsui will tell you that I'm pretty stubborn too."

"I might actually get a lie in, now you're living next door," Shunsui reflected, and Juushirou let out an amused chuckle.

"If I know Sora, and I do, she'll have told Shindou to make sure he doesn't let your discipline slip," he warned, and Sora nodded.

"Of course," she said frankly, as Shunsui groaned. "I'm not going to let the reputation of Eighth crumble just because your first Vice Captain got promoted."

"Then I think we can lay to rest any concerns about the rebuilding of Ninth," Midori observed. "Kyouki-sama, what of the health of your own son? I understand Ryuusei-dono was questioning his own position after the Real World incident."

"For the time being, Ryuusei will remain as Vice Captain of the Fifth," Kyouki's expression became shadowed, but she nodded. "Like Mikihara, he knows the role best, and in peace-time, that's an important thing to remember. But he's actively considering his future, and so am I. We intend to work hard with the Division's current third seat, Arai, with the view to making him Vice Captain at a future date."

"Oniisama is going to retire from the Gotei completely?" Sora let out a gasp, and Hakubei pressed his lips together, shaking his head.

"I wondered, from things he'd said to me," he owned. "Sora, Ryuu-nii is the heir to the Clan. That's the role he was born into, and if he had been killed in the Real World, that duty would've fallen to Seikyou, whose training is a long way from complete. Seikyou's going to the Academy, but Ryuu-nii's been considering prioritising his Clan position over his military one. Now that Seventh has set the precedent of not naming a First Degree Clan member as adjutant, Ryuu-nii doesn't see the need for him to keep up appearances if there's a better man to take on the role."

"Correct me if I'm wrong, but Ryuusei-dono lost his left arm?" Mareiko frowned. "My right has been impaired for a long time, and that was my sword-arm, but nobody has considered it wrong for me to stand here and do this duty. Surely Ryuusei-dono is right handed? Surely then, his sword arm..."

"It doesn't matter," Atsushi shook his head. "Your case is different, Mareiko. You still have your arm, and though it's impaired for holding a blade usefully, you're capable of using that arm if need be. It just isn't strong enough to wield a sword any longer. Ryuusei-dono is missing his arm completely. As a sword fighter, that loss puts you at a disadvantage whether you are right or left handed. And, for a shinigami, even more so. Ryuusei-dono's decision is a sound military one for the future of the Fifth Division and should be respected. If he can no longer do the job fully, then it makes sense for him to bow out. Even if he is the heir to the Clan."

“Ryuusei sees things much that way, and the Clan would prefer him at home dealing with family business,” Kyouki nodded. ‘I had planned to hand over my Captaincy to him at some point, because the Shiba complain a lot about my constant absences, but now it seems that things will move in the other direction. I will remain active Captain of the Fifth Division for the foreseeable future, and Ryuusei, when he retires, will be my deputy in District Five and will deal with the administrative issues there. He is very competent at such things, and much more so than a sixteen year old boy could be. Better him than Hakubei,’ she cast her second son a wry smile, “whose skill with a sword might be great, but whose head for figures is nonexistent.”

“Hey, I can count to ten, and that’s the number on the back of my haori, so that’s all that matters,” Hakubei seemed unconcerned by the criticism. “And Ryuu-nii already knows that I support his decision, if and when he makes it.”

“Nobody even mentioned it to me,” Sora murmured, and Kyouki cast her a glance.

“Because, Sora-chan, you’re no longer a Shiba in the political sense,” she said softly. “You were Vice Captain of the Eighth, now Captain of the Ninth. You’ve forged your own path — it’s no longer your decision to make.”

“No, not as a political entity,” Sora shook her head, “but you know, it would be nice if Ryuusei-nii remembered I’m his sister sometimes, too. It’s all right, Okaasama. It’s none of my business, as you said — and I’ll have plenty enough to do with Ninth and Mikihara to bother much about what goes on in Fifth anyway.”

“When Fifth are ready to consider a change, Kyouki-dono, please notify us of your choice of replacement as soon as you are able,” Nagesu interjected quickly. “The priority is to get the Gotei squads up and functioning at full throttle. Retsu-sama, I believe you are working on plans to return to Rukongai?”

“Indeed,” Retsu nodded sombrely. “The Fourth will begin sending representation back through the Senkaimon at the end of this month.”

“That soon?” Juushirou bit his lip, and Retsu offered him a smile.

“I intend to reduce the burden on all officers by rotating those stationed there from time to time,” she said evenly. “However, the support of other squads, as I mentioned before, will be required. I am in the process of drawing up a potential plan for this — and I hope to present it before the next Captains’ meeting. I wish to have the support of all of you and your squads, as I think we’ve already learned that Rukongai is too important for us to ignore.”

“The same will apply to the Real World, and part of the reason I’ve taken so long to process the Vice Captain nominations has been because I’ve been working on a similar overlay for Real World dispatch,” Nagesu added. “Next meeting, then, we will address both concerns and, between us, agree on the way forward for patrols. Sora-dono, I trust that you will have Ninth in some working order by that time?”

“I hope so,” Sora nodded. “I intend to begin trying to sort things out this afternoon, and I’m told that most of the patrols are still intact from Anabomi’s day. We should be fine, Nagesu-sama. Don’t delay on our account. Ninth will be ready alongside its fellows, and even if I can’t dispatch my Vice Captain into active military service for a while, I’m not afraid of undertaking it myself and leaving matters here in his hands.”

“Then for the time being, I think we can close,” Nagesu looked satisfied. “The next meeting will be two weeks from today, and all Captains should bring with them patrol data, so that we can hash out a working plan for these future deployments. Meeting dismissed.”

He raised his hand, and the great doors at the end of the chamber swung open once more, allowing daylight to stream into the dimly lit hall. Sora let out a sigh of relief, turning to leave with all the others, when she felt a hand on her shoulder.

“See, you did fine,” it was Shunsui’s voice, and she turned, offering him a rueful smile.

“Is it always like that? That formal, then that casual?”

“No...” Shunsui looked pensive. “Usually it’s just casual. Or if it isn’t, I’m rather good at making it that way. I’m sorry if we’ve destroyed your illusion of what a Captain is, Sora-chan... but you had to learn the truth sooner or later.”

“It’s quite reassuring,” Sora laughed, as she allowed him to lead her out towards the sunshine. “I thought I’d be afraid to speak, but I think I feel better, knowing now that I can. Even if I do have to stare at your ugly mug for most of the proceedings.”

“The same applies to me, you know,” Shunsui objected. “Still, I suppose we’ll both get used to it. And now I’m going to have to take my leave of you, because I want to grab Juushirou and discuss something with him before I head back and drop the entire weight of Vice Captain responsibility on Tetsuya’s unsuspecting head. You have your own duties now — and one of them has come to meet you.”

He gestured, and Sora’s eyes widened as she took in the slim form of her Vice Captain, standing to one side of the walkway. His arms were still heavily bandaged, but he was dressed in full uniform and, on his upper arm Hyakken wore the insignia of the Ninth Division. As they drew closer, he stepped forward, bowing his head.

“Mikihara!” Sora found her voice, only just managing to refrain from grabbing the man and giving him a shake. “What are you doing here? And in uniform, too? I thought you weren’t supposed to be actively up and about too much for the immediate future, and I know I told you that I’d come straight back to Ninth after this, so you didn’t need to bother about anything.”

“I apologise for the insubordination, Sora-dono,” Hyakken raised his gaze, and Sora was struck by the resolution that burned in their grey depths, “but it is the duty of a Vice Captain to meet his new Captain and to introduce her formally to the Division. Besides, the fresh air has done me good. I am not over-taxing myself, simply walking up here, and I have no intention of trying to do anything more strenuous than accompany you back. Everyone at Ninth is eagerly awaiting your arrival, and it would not be proper for you to arrive without my meeting you.”

“You still look like the wind might blow you away, Hyakken-dono,” Shunsui eyed the Ninth Vice Captain critically, and Hyakken managed a faint smile.

“Perhaps I am not recovered,” he admitted, “nor should I expect to be, after being at risk of my life. It is important, however, that Ninth see for themselves that I believe in Anabomi-taichou’s replacement. Even if I can’t hold a sword, there are things I can do — and I hope, Sora-dono will allow me to do them.”

“Well, keeping you out in the breeze and on your feet when you shouldn’t be roaming wild around Seireitei won’t endear me to the Unohana, so I suggest that we head back to Ninth,” Sora relented, offering Shunsui a resigned smile. “I’ll speak to you soon, Shunsui. My new Division calls.”

“Good luck,” Shunsui returned the smile with one of his own. “Not that I think you need it... and I should know.”

He winked again, then was gone, leaving the two, Captain and Vice Captain alone.

“Well, I suppose we’re going to Ninth,” Sora said with a sigh.

“Though I wish you’d told me you were going to come.”

“You would have tried to talk me out of it,” Hyakken said matter-of-factly, and Sora nodded.

“I would,” she agreed, “and I suppose you’d have come anyway, which wouldn’t have done much for my authority in front of the Ninth. Are they really that on edge about my coming that you felt you had to drag yourself up to come meet me? Because I know that it will take them time to get used to me, and I haven’t had all the time I hoped to speak to them, but...”

“I know my duty,” Hyakken shrugged his shoulders. “More, so do they. The Ninth is not entirely comprised of Kuchiki, but there is still a sense of doing things by the book that your predecessor instilled. They will understand far more clearly my support for you if they see us arrive together. As you said, you need my knowledge of them, and I need to have a purpose whilst my wounds recover, so facilitating your takeover will have to be it.”

“And if I send you home to your daughter instead?”

“I don’t think you’ll do that,” Hyakken offered her a knowing smile. “You’d hate it yourself, wouldn’t you, if you were hurt and sent away from the action instead of being allowed to heal right in the middle of the place you belong?”

“True,” Sora acknowledged. “All right. This time, you win — but only because I’m apprehensive myself about the Ninth and their accepting me fully as their new Captain. I intend to do my best, but running you into the ground while you heal isn’t on my agenda — so when we get back, you make sure you get off your feet and rest. I’m sure nobody wants to spend much time in Anabomi’s office considering that neither the stains nor the memories are likely to soon fade, but until I’ve worked out plans for my own work space, we can talk in the Vice Captain’s office quite adequately. I know that there are cushions in there, because I’ve seen them.”

“Yes, ma’am,” Hyakken inclined his head slightly, and Sora sighed.

“I’m nervous,” she admitted. “I’d hoped to spend more time at Ninth before the changeover, but with processing the aftermath of what happened at Eighth and seeing to the people there, it didn’t work out that way. I did speak to Sakura-chan and I did find out some things from her... but most of the others I still know only by sight, not by name. When I called by Ninth to see Ryuu, most of the members I saw just kind of stared at me, they didn’t seem to feel they could approach. I know Ryuu’s returned to Sixth now — and I don’t want to be walking into a wall of eyes and nothing else.”

Hyakken did not reply right away, and for a short while they walked in silence, Sora slowing her pace to match the slightly hesitant gait of her companion. Though he had said that he was not pushing himself, she knew that deep down he was. The grief that she had sensed in the air on her awkward visit to Ninth was there in Hyakken’s aura too — a need and determination to return to work to chase away the ghosts that were still deeply rooted within his soul and the soul of the Ninth. This was the real challenge that she faced, she recognised with a jolt. No matter how confident she was in her skills and her training experience, dealing with a Division still in mourning would be the trickiest part of the challenge. Would they even accept a new leader? Anabomi’s memorial had taken place the previous weekend, followed by those of his subordinates, and the bodies long since returned to District Six to be properly buried. Though some weeks had passed now since Keitarou’s invasion, the wounds were still likely to be raw.

As they reached the gate of the Ninth, Sora hesitated for a moment, her gaze flitting beyond the marble wall towards the place she had considered home for so many years. A tiny knot of homesickness curled up inside of her, but she forced it away, allowing her fingers to brush against the soft white of her haori as she reminded herself that that was the past now, and this was her future.

As though sensing her unease, Hyakken turned to glance at her, offering her a pensive smile.

“It’s a big change for all of us,” he said evenly. “Life must go on. They know that too. You needn’t worry, Sora-dono. You care about this Division, and I’ve seen that with my own eyes when you’ve come to talk to me about it. They’ll soon realise it too. You are the kind of Captain Anabomi-taichou would have probably chosen to succeed him. This is not really a Kuchiki Division any more than you are a Shiba Captain — Anabomi-taichou did not believe in it, even though at times he couldn’t avoid Guren-sama’s commands. He saw very clearly that Ninth’s future lay in separation and autonomy. He would accept you, as I have, and so, ultimately, will they.”

“Fukutaichou! Sora-dono!”

Before Sora could reply, there was an excited yell, and Sakura came skidding out of the gateway, almost tripping over her own feet in her hurry to greet the pair. Cheeks flushing red with embarrassment, she hastily righted herself, moving to bow properly before her two senior officers.

“I’m sorry. I meant to do that so much more neatly,” she admitted self-effacingly, and despite herself, Sora laughed, feeling some of her tension slip away.

“It’s quite all right, Sakura-chan,” she said warmly. “I’ve spent my last twenty-five years at the Eighth. I don’t know the first thing about keeping up appearances.”

She held out a hand to pat the younger woman on the shoulder.

“Truth is, you’ve helped settle my nerves,” she added. “Is everyone assembled inside? I think I’m ready now to meet the Division properly and formally as a Captain should.”

“Yes, ma’am,” Sakura nodded eagerly. “Fukutaichou gave me strict instructions and so the whole Division is waiting in the yard to meet you.”

“Thank you, Takaoka,” Hyakken offered a faint smile. “We’ll be coming there now.”

“I thought I told you you were going to go sit down and rest,” Sora shot her new adjutant a sidelong glance. “You can come in with me and introduce me, fair enough, but after that you’re retiring to the office to wait for me. You can take that as a stern order from your new Captain and I won’t tolerate any deviation from it.”

Sakura’s eyes widened at this casual, blunt instruction, but Hyakken’s expression became rueful and he nodded.

“I will,” he promised. “Once I’ve discharged my duty to my previous Captain in bringing forth his successor, I’ll embrace fully my new Captain’s orders and follow them to the letter. You needn’t worry, Sora-dono. I don’t intend on being troublesome.”

“Then good,” Sora looked satisfied. “Sakura, we’re coming in now. Run in and tell them, all right?”

“Yes, ma’am!” Sakura saluted, then disappeared, leaving her two fellow officers to follow.

“She’s working double-time, isn’t she, in the absence of any other higher seats?” Sora murmured as they crossed the threshold, Hyakken leading the way around the side of the barracks to the Ninth Division’s training yard. “Is there something we can do about that, Mikihara? Ryuu said it too — that despite all she’s been through, Sakura’s been taking charge and supporting the other members as much as she’s been able.”

“You mean in terms of promotion?” Hyakken looked thoughtful, then he nodded. "Ryuu-dono also mentioned her name to me when he came to visit me before I was discharged. He said the same thing you just did. Ryuu-dono is a self-effacing man and doesn't usually like to claim credit for his own influence in these things, but even given that, he made it sound as though Ninth would have gone to pieces without Takaoka's efforts. Even though in many ways she had the most traumatic experience of all of them, witnessing the murder of her comrades and coming under the attack of a possessed Captain, she's not let it scar her, nor has she talked about leaving the Division. She isn't the only member who isn't a Kuchiki, but she is the only one with such high rank and long experience in the squad at present. She joined because of Anabomi-taichou, but I wouldn't have been surprised if she had said she wanted to leave and, being a Yamamoto, she would probably have managed to find a place in Eleventh or even First based on her military conduct. She hasn't done that, and Ryuu said that she gave short shrift to any recruit or other member who dared suggest trying to leave to go elsewhere. I think that loyalty ought to be rewarded with promotion, too."

"Then when the formal mourning period is over, we'll promote her." Sora decided. "And from that point, we'll build up. Even if it happens bit by bit, I intend to go to the Academy like Anabomi did. If necessary, I'll steal recruits out from under Juushirou's nose."

She grinned mischievously.

"I know him and I know all his tactics," she added, "so I'm sure that I can bring some more people our way. Too many District students haven't completed the Academy programme successfully or have felt forced into dropping out, but if they know that the whole Gotei are now interested in recruiting them alongside Clansfolk, I think that might change. Right now, though... first things first."

Hyakken nodded, and they stepped out into the yard, Sora pausing for a moment as, like one person, every gaze turned towards her. There was a hush, and Sora swallowed hard, feeling the tension come creeping back into her body. Then Hyakken stepped forward, and Sora was startled by his change in demeanour, for the steely glint in his grey eyes made him suddenly seem not so frail and delicate.

"Is that the way Ninth Division greets its new Captain?" he demanded, in crisp, curt tones that carried across the whole of the yard. "You don't need me to tell you that you bow before an officer of high rank."

There was a sudden sense of fidgeting and discomfort from within the ranks, then Sora watched with a mixture of bewilderment and fascination as the gaggle of officers suddenly formed themselves into straighter lines, bowing their heads towards her. Despite the pressure, something about the robotic solemnity of the process made her want to laugh, and she bit her lip, hoping that they would not sense her amusement and be offended by it. It took a moment for her to regain her composure, but she took a deep breath, moving forward into the heart of the courtyard proper.

“At ease,” she said softly, and, slowly, the Ninth Division officers obeyed, raising their gazes to hers. Some faces she knew, but many she did not, and there were questions and hesitations in the expressions of many. She pressed her lips together, berating herself for her moment of mirth. This was a serious situation and she needed to face it like a Captain.

Preferably not one like Shunsui. I chose a bad role model. Oh well. How would Juushirou deal with this? It's either him or Hirata, and I think this squad's had enough of Seventh Division's hunter ethic for the time being.

She took another deep breath, then,

“Ninth has been through a lot of stuff, lately,” she said gravely. “I don’t expect any of you to forget or overcome the things you feel about that right away. You have lost a Captain who loved you all very much — and talking to Mikihara has made me realise exactly how important he was to all of you. You’ve also lost other officers, and must miss them badly, too. It means a lot of changes from this point on.”

She offered Hyakken a smile, then,

“I’m not Anabomi,” she added. “I’m not going to be the Captain he was, nor will I have all of the same expectations of my members. But one thing I think is really important is this Division’s sense of identity. I’m a stranger here, and you know Ninth better than me. I will take time to get to know all of you and work with you in whatever regard is necessary, but I want you to all understand that I also believe in Ninth Division and its future as a Division that stands equal and proud to any and all other squads in Seireitei. If I didn’t have that commitment, I wouldn’t have accepted this position. I hope you’ll all help me to do that, and to implement the changes that will have to come as a result of the losses here. As I said, I don’t expect you to put those events behind you immediately — but as a military organisation, even in grief, we can’t simply stand still. The Captains are already discussing deployments to the Real World and Rukongai, and I told them that Ninth Division would be ready and prepared to take its place with the others when that time came. I am confident from all Mikihara has told me that you're not going to make me break that promise, so I want to begin getting to grips with this squad and its systems right away."

She gestured to Hyakken.

"For the time being, Mikihara will not be taking drills or practical sword training sessions, not until the Fourth decide he is healed enough to do so," she continued. "I will personally take on any of those duties for the foreseeable future, as it will give me a chance to get to know people. Mikihara has told me that he usually organises patrols and things of that nature, and he is happy to continue to do so. That leaves me to do the job of getting to know every other bit of Ninth, and, particularly, its strengths and weaknesses. Mikihara, do you have anything else you want to say before I dismiss you to go over the patrol paperwork for this week?"

"Just that I want everyone to be clear that Sora-dono is a Captain I have agreed to serve because I believe she is the right person to continue what Anabomi-taichou began," Hyakken said matter-of-factly. "We are our own Division, and we will continue to evolve as such. You may all consider any insubordination against Sora-dono as insubordination against me, against Anabomi-taichou, and against the spirit of the Ninth Division itself. Sora-dono might be forgiving of such things in the early part of her time here... but I will absolutely not be. And, even if I cannot draw my sword at present, I am still capable of overseeing necessary discipline. Remember that any such action will simply be dishonouring the memory of the officers who lost their lives here. I believe Anabomi-taichou would welcome this change, and so, so do I. I trust you all understand?"

There was a collective assent, and Sora pursed her lips, taking in once again the sudden vigour that had apparently animated her companion's frail frame.

He may be overdoing it, but this is the Vice Captain I'm working with. Strict, disciplined, and a soldier. He wants them to make a good impression on me as much as he wants them to accept me. Completely different from Eighth, where Shunsui left me to do the paperwork when he could and threw disciplinary challenges my way all the time. Mikihara sees himself as the one who does those things... and I'm probably going to let him. Well, it might be nice to have extra time to think about other matters for a change.

"In which case, Mikihara, you're dismissed. With the Captains' meeting only a fortnight away, and so much to reorganise, it's better you begin looking through papers right away," she said aloud, and Hyakken bowed his head solemnly in her direction before turning on his heel and disappearing back towards the main barracks. Her words had been casual, but she had seen the gratitude in the man's eyes for making out that his relegation to the office was due to a heavy workload than to the state of his injury.

"Right then," once he was gone, Sora turned her attention back to the gathered Division members. "Sakura-chan, I'm going to need your help with this, if you don't mind. I intend on organising a brief, brisk training exercise to get a feel for everyone and the range of skills they have. You know everyone far better than me, so I'm going to rely on you to assist. First of all I want to know what other higher seated officers I have — Ninth Division has a Seventh and an Eighth seat as well, I trust? And a Ninth and a Tenth?"

"Yes, ma'am," Sakura nodded, gesturing towards the group of officers and, one by one, four men stood forward. "They were on patrol on Anabomi-taichou's orders at the time of the attack, but returned safely to Inner Seireitei a day or two later with no reported losses in the field. Shall I present them to you?"

Present them..?

Sora blinked, then reminded herself again of the formality the Ninth was used to, and she nodded her head.

"Please, do," she agreed, and Sakura beamed, beginning to introduce each of the seated officers in turn. As she did so, Sora took another careful glance around the Division, noticing how the tension in the air had begun to dissipate. A slight smile touched her lips.

Well, so here it begins. I'm really the Ninth Captain now — and from this point on, that's where my loyalties will have to be. This isn't a squad that can take more grief and pain — so whatever else I do with Shunsui's nomination, I'm going to make sure I win the trust of these people and turn them back into what Anabomi wanted them to be — a Division where people want to recruit and work. So it's not quite the casual family atmosphere of Eighth yet, but there's time. Time to rebuild from the ashes, and create the kind of Division that can stand proud among the rest.

The path was a well-trodden one, where the grass had been worn away by years of sandalled pilgrimages up the same hill. At the top, the glint of sunlight off the golden gates seemed almost ethereal, and Mareiko paused, shielding her gaze from the bulk of the glare as she surveyed her surroundings.

Her heart was heavy, yet at the same time, determined. Pressing her lips together in a thin line, she marched forward, resting her hand momentarily against the gilted railings before reaching into the folds of her obi for the ring of keys she always carried with her. Today she wore no haori, and her sword had stayed at home. She had not come as the Twelfth Division Captain, but simply as an off-duty shinigami, to a place that, over the course of the past twenty five years had become as familiar to her as her own Division grounds.

Or maybe, considering the frequent rebuildings that took place there, more so.

A faint smile touched her lips, but it was quickly gone, and she fumbled through the keys for the right one. As she did so, though, the gate creaked slightly beneath her touch, and to her surprise, she found that it was already unlocked. Someone had come before her, she realised, pushing the divide back and returning the keys to the safety of her belt. In all the times she had previously visited, she had generally been alone, yet there was no mistake. Today, another had arrived here before her and, as she reached her final destination, she could see her companion, his tail of fair hair fluttering in the wind.

“Nagesu... sama.”

The words left her lips before she realised they were going to, and the man turned, offering her a pensive smile.

“Mareiko. I wondered if you might come here... I know that you often have. Michihashi told me that when you needed time to think, this is where he knew he could always find you.”

“Did you come looking for me, sir?” Mareiko was immediately on her guard, but Nagesu shook his head.

“I came to ponder the rightness or wrongness of the decisions we all make,” he admitted. “I came to see your Captain’s plaque, and to consider whether or not it ought to remain.”

Mareiko did not respond for a moment, instead picking her way across the uneven tufts of grass towards the far wall to stand at her Clan leader’s side. Her gaze strayed to a stretch of marble wall which had been carefully and religiously cleared of creeping ivy and other weeds and plants that had woven their way over other parts, papering over cracks and chips that weather and neglect had ripped through some of the older markers.

No bodies were buried here, but nonetheless, this was a place of reverence, for in this enclosed space, surrounded by trees and birds and aesthetic landscaping were the memorials of all of the Captains who had ever died fighting for Seireitei. It was older than the current Gotei squad system, older even than the Council of Elders, and some of the plaques were so ancient that it was no longer possible to read the names of the individuals that had once been hammered into the rusted metal. Of all those who had been remembered here, Shougo's marker was the newest but, as she glanced around her, Mareiko could see that already wooden pegs had marked out a new spot, and her heart ached suddenly in her chest as she recognised the badge of the Kuchiki and knew this would be the place where Anabomi would be added to the rest.

"Anabomi-taichou's marker will be very close to Taichou's," she said at last, turning her back on it and meeting her Clan leader's gaze instead. "Do you think he'd be happy about that, Nagesu-sama? It was Shougo-dono's potion that made him a monster... do you think he'd want to be here, if he'd known what his friend had done?"

"I don't know," Nagesu admitted, looking troubled, and he reached out a hand to brush it against Shougo's plaque. "I want to believe that that, at least, was some kind of terrible accident. When you betray your Clan, your subordinates, your colleagues, it's a lonely reality. Shougo-dono sacrificed all of those things for a goal of his own... but I've been going over everything from that lab, and I can't find a single piece of evidence that he meant Anabomi any harm. The journal we retrieved from Ninth is full of notes and formula, but I believe he gave it to Anabomi for safe-keeping, not with the intention of making Anabomi a test subject. It would've been too risky... and Anabomi died without any suspicions of the depths of his friend's work. Whatever made him drink that potion, I want to believe his death was never in Shougo-dono's plans."

"I don't see why it couldn't have been," Mareiko's words held a bitter edge. "He intended it for everyone else who trusted him. Why not Anabomi as well?"

"Mareiko..." Nagesu cast her a startled glance, then he sighed, shaking his head.

"I'm sorry," he murmured. "He hurt you more than anyone... I suppose I shouldn't be surprised to hear the anger in your voice."

"You mistake me, sir," Mareiko shook her head, her eyes darkening momentarily with resolve. "I'm not angry with him. I don't know how to be. If I'm angry, I think it's just with myself. I was inadequate in many ways, and I never understood. I put Atsushi-kun through so much suffering because I didn't understand, and then I made it worse by drugging my Division and trying to kill him. When I think of how easily I was manipulated to do such things, I realise how easy it was for Taichou to fool me. I was blind. That's all. Taichou isn't to blame. I am."

"Perhaps that extends to all of us, but it doesn't change the severity of his crimes," Nagesu reflected. "Atsushi-dono is the only one who saw through him, and as we now know, paid a heavy price for it. He's a brave man, Mareiko. I'm glad you've decided to train with him again. I've often regretted how badly you were hurt in the Rukon incident, but if you believe you can fight with your left hand instead, then perhaps..."

"I want to be a useful Captain to the Gotei in whatever way you need me," Mareiko said firmly. "That's all that matters to me now. Atsushi-kun made me realise how bad this has been for Twelfth, not just me. I have to... to lift them and make them believe that was the past. I became a Captain because I wanted to finish Taichou's work, but I realise that I never understood what that meant. Now I do, I want no part of it. Of any of it. Not even if I do owe him the biggest debt for making me his Vice Captain and giving me the life I have now."

"Mm," Nagesu was silent for a moment, then he sighed, slipping his fingers into his obi and pulling out a sheet of faded paper, the edges curled and worn with age. He hesitated for a moment, running the folded sheet between his index finger and thumb absently, and Mareiko saw the indecision in his pale eyes.

"Is something wrong?" she asked quietly, and Nagesu glanced at the sheet, tapping his index finger against it once more.

"We've never talked about your family," he said softly. "I knew, of course, that your parents had adopted you... but it never seemed important that they had."

"Nagesu-sama?" Mareiko's eyes widened with consternation, and Nagesu offered her a sad smile.

"I knew that Daigo-dono had arranged the adoption," he continued evenly. "He told the Urahara court that you were the child of a noblewoman who had lost her husband and who had fallen on hard times. He said that he had seen spiritual potential in you, and the Sekime family were eager to make you their child. I knew that your mother... your adoptive mother... was unable to conceive, and so you were the answer to her prayers. The moment I first saw you, I didn't doubt a word Daigo-dono had said. You were so obviously Urahara. I never asked any questions. I never thought I needed to."

Mareiko chewed on her lip, lowering her head in shame.

"I'm not that," she murmured. "I know that my mother and father weren't married, Nagesu-sama. And my mother... was outside the degrees of Clan. I can't tell you about my father, but I've always known those things. Only my adoptive parents made me promise not to talk about it, and so I haven't. Daigo-sama and Taichou looked after me and I never wanted for anything because of their kindness. I was trained, educated, and given this position to shine in the Gotei. I was in a position where I was even able to be useful to a man of your status... things an illegitimate child like me should never aspire to."

"No," Nagesu clicked his tongue against the roof of his mouth, looking troubled. "No, I'm rather afraid that attitude has lurked in the shadows of far too much for far too long. Daigo-dono took those three creatures he turned to Hollow from the jails, true enough, but two of them were born as you were — illegitimate. He used them for his experiments, but instead, he saw a different potential in you. He found you a home and gave you favour and attention not befitting your rank. Did you never wonder why he did it?"

"I always thought it was because my mother was in trouble and he took pity on me," Mareiko owned. "I didn't have any other explanation... or any reason to doubt his intentions. Only now... since all of this... maybe I do wonder. And if what you just said is true... it makes me wonder what he did with my mother. Whether... whether she was one of his experiments, too..."

She faltered, her voice breaking slightly, and Nagesu grasped her by the shoulders, giving her a gentle shake as tears glittered against her lashes.

"I've found no evidence of that," he assured her. "I don't know what happened to your mother, Mareiko, but I am certain she wasn't one of Daigo's test subjects. I have a lot of warrants and a paper trail of evidence identifying several individuals who were, but your mother is not among them."

"You know my mother's name!" Mareiko's head shot up, and Nagesu nodded.

"I do."

"Then you came here knowing... what I just told you about myself, you already..."

"I came with the same doubts in my heart you have about Shougo-dono's motives where you were concerned," Nagesu admitted. "I didn't expect to see you now, but its as well we speak here than at Twelfth, where people might overhear things they should not. I think it best that this discussion remains between the two of us.”

“Sir?” Now Mareiko was well and truly on edge, and Nagesu relinquished his grip on her shoulders, glancing at the paper which had become creased as a result of his impulsive gesture.

“This was among the papers I retrieved from the Real World. I found it in among some others — one of which identified the third of Daigo’s hollow men, who fought and decimated Fifth Division’s members,” the Third Division Captain spoke grimly. “It seemed to have no connection to anything, but the more I read through Daigo-dono’s diary and the notes added by his son, the more I began to see the whole picture. For the first time I understood their real intentions where you were concerned... the reason they were so interested in you, and why you did not become one of their experiments.”

“Because of that letter?” Mareiko asked faintly, and Nagesu shrugged.

“It’s a love letter,” he owned. “A letter from your father to your mother, written a long time ago.”

“My... father?” Mareiko blanched, and she held up her hands. “I don’t... I don’t need... I don’t want... he... he never came after me, or helped my mother, so I never... Nagesu-sama, if you want to denounce me as your kinswoman, and reject me, then I will accept your judgement, but please, don’t humiliate... don’t make me...”

“Shh,” Nagesu shook his head, his pale eyes softening behind his glasses. “Calm yourself. I have no intention of doing that. This whole incident has taught me that the value we place on purity of birth and lineage is a false security. I have been betrayed enough times by men and women of pure blood. In the last few weeks, though, I have met a young boy who saved all of Seireitei, even though he willingly signed himself off as illegitimate and turned his back on both the Clans to whom he could claim connections. I’ve met those who’ve lived in shadows for years based on my Father’s decisions, yet in our time of need, they stepped forward and contributed to this war effort. And I’ve always had you too, Mareiko... and your science. Even now, after being dealt this kind of a blow, you’ve rallied and you’ve come through for me. I don’t care how you came into this world. I’m just glad that you did.”

“Please, don’t say such things,” stricken, Mareiko could not prevent the tears from falling, and she grasped Nagesu’s arm, shaking her head in dismay. “I’m not... I’m such a failure in all ways. If you knew... if you understood...”

“I understand that, over the last twenty-five years, you have proven yourself more adept and useful with your scientific gifts than your predecessor ever managed to do,” Nagesu cut across her. “And now I know why. I understand what Daigo and Shougo wanted to cultivate by training and patronising you. I value your involvement in Seireitei, Mareiko, and I intend to keep you exactly where you are for as long as you’re willing to serve.”

“But I... if you listen, if you let me... I need to... all the things I’ve...” Mareiko was beside herself now, unable to form a coherent sentence, and Nagesu gently detached his arm from her grip.

“We both trusted a man who betrayed us, and it’s a hard pill to swallow,” he said soberly. “But I believe, so long as I have your support, not all is lost. He gave you to me and, as a scientific aide, you are not replaceable. So please don’t tell me you intend to hang up your haori, Mareiko. If you do, I will be lost, and so will Seireitei. Your work and your research is pivotal — and I haven’t forgotten that, by your giving my notes to Ukitake, it fell into the hands of a promising young scientist who was able to see through the flaws to the truth beneath. I won’t ever disclose the truth of your origins to anyone, Clan or otherwise, so in return, I want you to promise you won’t let this come between you and your duty. We both know Twelfth needs you — more badly now than it ever has.”

For a moment Mareiko was too choked to form an answer, then she gulped, reaching up to wipe away her tears with the sleeve of her haori.

“I don’t deserve your kindness,” she whispered, her voice shaking with the depth of her emotion. “I don’t and I never have, but I promise, I won’t ever disappoint you again. I won’t ever do anything to shame you or the Gotei, so long as I live. I promised Atsushi-kun that I wouldn’t leave Twelfth, because even if I don’t feel that I deserve to be there, Aoi and the others need me. I know they do... because I know what it’s like, when you’re a Vice Captain and your Captain is suddenly ripped away. I won’t do that to them, so I’ll stay. I promise, I’ll stay.”

“Then I feel safe in revealing this to you,” Nagesu held out the letter, and Mareiko hesitated, then took it nervously between her fingers.

“I haven’t ever thought much about my father,” she murmured. “He left mother alone to fend for herself. If not for Daigo-sama...”

“Your father died the same year you were born. In fact, I think it highly possible he died before you were born,” Nagesu said gently, and Mareiko was struck dumb, her eyes becoming wide with disbelief. Nagesu nodded.

“I don’t know whether he would have claimed you or whether he would not. I don’t even know if he knew about you,” he admitted. “In a Clan, such things aren’t talked about. I certainly knew nothing of it until I found that letter, and began to piece together the clues. Well, Clans are complicated and full of levels of deception — as well you know. Putting together the entire picture and knowing I was right was only possible when I went back home and dug through old papers there to fill in the gaps. Once I did, though, it all became blindingly clear.”

“Yes, but...” Mareiko swallowed hard. “He was dead all this time? I’ve thought such bad things about him, when really...”

“Dead men can do little in this world,” Nagesu reflected, “but sometimes the shadows they cast are long ones. Your father fell in love with a woman who his family disapproved of. She was born too low — outside the degrees of the Clan — and so he was forbidden to marry her. But he didn’t ever stop seeing her. He married the woman his father told him to, and he had the son he was expected to have, but he never abandoned the woman he truly loved. He tried to hide her away, instead. How much he succeeded, I don’t know... I was just a child myself when he died. My father probably knew... but my father was not an understanding man, and circumstances made him worse.”

He sighed, removing the glasses from his nose and rubbing them against his haori to clean the lenses.

“Read the letter,” he instructed. “Not here, if you don’t wish to, but in your own time, when you’re ready. Like I said, it’s a love letter. When Daigo met your mother, she must have shown it to him as proof of her connection to your father. That’s why he took you. She couldn’t feed you, so she made a deal with him. She sold you into his care to ensure you would have a better life, and in return, she cut off communication with you. She had to, because otherwise it would have become known, whose child you were. And that didn’t suit Daigo-dono, nor would it have helped you.”

Mareiko swallowed hard, her fingers trembling around the precious piece of aging parchment.

“Please, sir,” she murmured. “I’d like you to tell me... my father’s name.”

I can see from your eyes that you already suspect the answer, “Nagesu reflected.” Just as he was, you are quick to put pieces together. You inherited his brilliance. Shougo-dono knew that. I wonder if, eventually, he would have tried to use you to help him in his plans, if not for Atsushi-dono’s challenge. Maybe he would. I can’t help but think he was grooming you for that purpose, only your friendship with Atsushi-dono got in his way. He intended to put an end to it — one way or the other.”

“And so he planned to kill me, or at least, tell Atsushi-kun he would, to make him angry,” Mareiko felt the anger and indignation flicker up inside of her at this. “He played all of us far more than I thought. Which means that my father, he must have been someone considerable. Someone intelligent. Someone whose talents Daigo-sama and Taichou thought they could exploit through me, even if he was dead. Someone who was skilled with working with lots of different mediums... and whose research notes I might have understood. Someone... someone like...”

She faltered, and Nagesu smiled sadly, nodding his head.

“Someone like my uncle,” he agreed wistfully. “Urahara Keitsune. Keitarou’s father.”

Mareiko’s legs wobbled beneath her at this, and she put out a hand to steady herself, her fingers brushing against the plaque that bore Shougo’s name. Suddenly angry, she balled her fist, punching the plaque with her left hand, again and again until blood glistened across her knuckles.

“Mareiko!” Nagesu looked horrified, moving to stop her, but she took no notice, placing the letter in her obi and resting her palms either side of the plaque as, at last, the rage began to flood through her body.

“You lost track of Keitarou, but instead you found me, and you decided to use me!” she exclaimed, her voice shaking once more, but this time with the suppressed fury of twenty five years. “You took me and made me think I was indebted to you, when all the time you were thinking of how you could best exploit me for my father’s bloodline! You lied to me and manipulated me and made me doubt my closest friend, Taichou! No, you don’t even deserve to be called by that title! You were never really a Captain... just like Atsushi-kun told you, before you died. You weren’t fit to wear the haori, and I only wish I’d seen it before you died, because if I had... if I had had my full strength, and I had known what you were, it wouldn’t have been his sword which would’ve killed you. It would’ve been mine!”

“Woah.” Nagesu’s firm hand on her shoulder brought her abruptly back to herself, and she flushed red, realising that she had lost her cool in front of her startled Clan leader. She drew a deep breath into her lungs, lowering her hands from the wall.

“I’m sorry, sir,” she said contritely. “A lot’s been going on inside of me, since the day Seireitei was attacked. And now all the things I’ve never known, I know. But it’s too late. Too late to deal with Taichou. Too late to speak to Father and apologise to him for thinking of him in contempt all these years. Too late to take back the gratitude I had for Daigo-sama. Too late to even try and reach Keitarou. If I’d known this before, maybe... maybe I could...”

She swallowed hard, struggling to compose herself as a thought occurred to her.

“You said the letter was in Taichou’s lab,” she murmured. “Nagesu-sama, do you think... did Keitarou know about this?”

“If he had, I imagine he would’ve tried to exploit the connection in the way he did with that poor, foolish Kotetsu boy,” Nagesu reflected, and Mareiko swallowed hard, remembering the ease with which the scientist had met with her, how few questions he had asked, and how he had paid attention to everything she had told him when she had handed him the file. So she had not known about the secret lab, she told herself bitterly, but something in what she had given Keitarou had given him that knowledge. Had he simply taken a gamble on a bitter shinigami grieving for a lost leader, or had, as time gone on, he manipulated her for another reason? Had he even seen the letter, buried deep in endless mounds of books and paperwork, or had he exploited her connection to him in secret, amusing himself by turning the screw on her anger against Seireitei?

Did he keep it a secret from them and from me because I was useful to him, then, or because he knew we were siblings, and he had another plan for me? I’ll never know... and somehow, I’m glad. I had a luckier escape than I deserved in all respects.

“Mareiko?” Nagesu’s tone was concerned, and Mareiko chewed down on her lip, hoping that her expression did not betray her thoughts.

“If I had known this, what would I have done?” she whispered, more than half to herself. “Could I have done something differently?”

“Keitarou became what he was because of things beyond the control of you or I.” Nagesu shook his head gravely, “but he won’t be burned as a traitor, or mutilated in any way. I intend him to be interred with Urahara, in the plot his father ought to have laid in, had it not been for the reidoku incident. All the land was stripped from Keitsune-jisama after his execution, and redistributed to other people in his place. The mausoleum, however, is sacrosanct. And, since Keitarou's son is now with the Gotei, I want to draw a line under the hatred and give Keitarou a proper burial. It's not as though there's anything else left to do for him."

Keitarou's son. Kohaku. My... my nephew.

Mareiko's eyes widened for a moment as she digested this.

Thank goodness none of Keitarou's family knew he was talking to me... at least I can be sure this boy doesn't know the first thing about me, which is a very good thing if he's going to be living next door to my Division from now on.

"Keitarou was my brother, and your cousin," at length she found words, her eyes once more wet with tears. "When Shougo-dono chose me as his Vice Captain, people said I was Daigo-sama's illegitimate daughter, but he let it go. He let it go, because he knew that I wasn't. But he didn't deny it, because he knew he couldn't admit who I really was. I'll always wonder, though, Nagesu-sama. Even knowing all the things Keitarou did, even so, if I had known Father's name when I was younger, would I have tried to find Keitarou? Help Keitarou? Would I have been able to reach him in a way nobody else could?"

"It's not a question anyone will ever answer," Nagesu reminded her. "All we can do is look forward. You, Kohaku, me. The people for whom Keitarou was family, not just public enemy number one."

"You still cared about him, sir, didn't you?" Mareiko hazarded, and Nagesu nodded.

"I always will," he said simply. "The Keitarou I taught to write his name, the one who followed me around and who always wanted to explore... I don't want to ever forget that he existed. He's the man I'm burying, back in District Three. If the Clan understand or they don't, I still intend to do it. Father rent the Clan apart with his decisions. I'm going to use every breath left in me to knit it back together. Whatever it takes."

Mareiko was silent for a moment, then she turned her back on Shougo's plaque, leaning up against the wall and offering her Clan leader a bittersweet smile.

"I'll be here to help you, as much as I can," she promised. "I'll work hard with Atsushi-kun and become a shinigami you can rely on in all ways again, and then, whatever I can do to help, I will. I think... it's what Keitsune-sama would have wanted. And... now I know the truth... I think it's the best response I could ever give Taichou. I'm nobody's puppet. Nobody's fool. Nobody's tool. I'm an Urahara and I support my Clan Leader, as Captain of the Twelfth Division until the day I die. I think Taichou's plaque should remain, Nagesu-sama. As a reminder to all of us... that we can easily be deceived by those we trust the most."

"And, perhaps, that justice always finds us," Nagesu mused. He nodded. "Very well. If you feel that way, then I will agree. Shougo-dono will remain here. If I can bury Keitarou, then I can turn the page on Shougo-dono and his father, too. They're gone and the world is changing. We'll soon leave them far, far behind."

"Beneath the ivy, perhaps," Mareiko fingered a nearby tendril. "I've spent a lot of time clearing and polishing Taichou's plaque, but instead, maybe, I'll let it be eaten by the plants. Anabomi's seems far more deserving. When his plaque is placed here, I think I'll come polish it sometimes instead. He was my comrade, not my kinsman, but he and I were both poisoned by the same evil man. For that reason, even if Anabomi has no family to do it, I will."

She smiled.

"I think, that way, I might heal," she added. "Reminding me of the reason he died, and the reason I'm still alive will help me focus on what I still need to do from this point on to lead Twelfth as a Captain should."

"I still don't understand why I have to do this blindfolded."

Kohaku put his fingers to the cloth strip covering his eyes, only to hear Kirio's laugh then feel her hands pulling his back down to his sides.

"Because it will be all the more spectacular if you don't get any clues about it beforehand," she said lightly, and Kohaku felt her arm slide through his, purposefully leading him forward. "It's all right, nobody'll let you walk into anything or anyone."

"Izumi's blindfolded too, and she's not complaining," Ketsui's voice added to the mix, and Kohaku frowned, pressing his lips together in a pout.

"If she was, I wouldn't know, because I can't see her hands," he objected. "Why won't you tell me where we're going? I still have two chapters on Sakusen to read before tomorrow's review with Taichou, and I promised him I wouldn't get behind. Just because this evening I'm technically free from any kind of duty doesn't mean that..."

"Oh, shut up and go with the flow, will you?" A light cuff across the back of his head accompanied Kayashima's unsympathetic interruption, and Kohaku bristled, flailing his own arm in the direction he thought his friend was standing. "Hey! Be careful what you're doing with that! You'll have someone's eye out if you're not careful!"

"If I had use of my eyes, I'd know better where you were," Kohaku shot back, and there was the sound of Kayashima's derisive snort.

"Don't give me that," he said frankly. "You see plenty of things without using your eyes, and you sure as hell know how to find people's reiryoku. You were aiming that right at me, so don't pretend otherwise. This wasn't all my idea, you know. Kirio-san was the one who suggested blindfolding you — and Ichimaru-san isn't putting up half the fight you are."

"Like I said, I can't see her, so I don't know if that's true or not," Kohaku began his objections once more, but at that moment they suddenly halted, and the final member of the party's voice broke through the banter.

"We're here, so you can take the blindfolds off now, Kirio — Ketsuikun. They ought to see this for themselves — given how beautiful the weather is tonight, I think they'll be suitably impressed."

"At last," Kohaku pulled a graphic face, as he heard Kirio laugh, but obediently begin to loosen the rough bandana that had been looped around his head as they had left the Seireitei Gate. As light began to penetrate his vision once more, he raised his fists to his eyes, rubbing them to remove the sensation of cloth pressing against his lids.

He had been a recruit of the Thirteenth Division for almost a month now, and in that time period he had quickly learned that his new Division mates had no intention whatsoever of treating him with kid gloves. Since the first day he had been thrown into the parade yard, he had been considered one of the pack and fair game for any mischief or pranks that happened to be going around and so, as he apprehensively opened his eyes, he was half expecting to find himself in the middle of some horribly embarrassing situation. As he took in his surroundings, however, any further protests he might have had died on his lips, his mouth forming a perfect 'o' of surprise. Alongside him, Ketsui had removed Izumi's own bandana, and had the girl been able to speak, Kohaku felt sure she would have let out an exclamation of amazement at the scene that lay before them.

It was night, and they had come to one of the local villages that were dotted around the border between Inner Seireitei and the District lands beyond. Kohaku had come here before on one or two occasions, to get supplies or take messages, but although he was familiar with the streets and houses on an everyday basis, that night everything seemed like it had come from another world. Magic had touched the settlement, for every tree was woven with thread and paper decorations, and from the fronts of each home hung coloured lanterns with long trailing streamers like the tails of a comet, carefully fashioned from local materials. The entirety of the main street was lit with flames deep within some of these lanterns, giving the whole area a gentle, enticing glow. Above his head, the sky was clear as he had ever seen it, the stars glittering like tiny white diamonds embedded in a velvety expanse that seemed to go on forever. Despite himself his heart caught in his throat as he absorbed the merry beauty of what he was seeing, and Kirio gave a nod of triumph.

“You see? I told you the blindfold was a good idea, Shiki-chan,” she said, nudging her companion and the final speaker with a knowing smile. “I said that they’d get the full effect better this way. Well, you two? Have you ever seen anything like this before? I bet you haven’t — I bet this is your first matsuri, right?”

“Matsuri?” Somehow Kohaku drew his eyes away from the colours and the lights, fixing Kirio with a bewildered look, and Kayashima smirked, clapping him condescendingly on the back.

“Tanabata. Tanabata,” he said, causing Kohaku to blink at him in non-plussed silence. “It’s what it’s called. Tanabata. When I was a kid they used to have streamers and lanterns from one end of the main street to the other, just like this — even if nobody could buy materials, they always found something to use to make it look special.”

“Tanabata is a Star Festival, Kohaku,” Ketsui shot the bemused recruit a sidelong grin. “It’s celebrated a lot across the Districts at this time of the year. District communities are more superstitious than Clan ones, in some ways — I don’t know if the Clans celebrate it or if they don’t. But I remember that in our village in Eighth, there was one house who’d always deck out with lanterns covered in every single flower they could find and Ten-nii used to see whether I could name them all — though I never could and nor could he. We had our own names for most of them. Mother used to help make some of the village decorations, and then we’d all get to write our wishes on strips of paper and the village leaders would make sure everyone's got hung up in this great tall bamboo tree that stood at the very corner of the square."

"I used to get my sister to tell me the story of the Tanabata stars pretty much every year till we were separated," Kirio remembered. "What about you, Shiki-chan? I assume the Ukitake family celebrated Tanabata?"

"Yes, though our wishes were often draped over the roof of the house on bamboo sticks, because Shinkei-nii thought it was more fun that way," Shikiki dimpled, looking amused. "Okaasama would always yell at him about it, but he'd do it anyway, and then when they had to be burned the next day, he'd have to go bring them all down again. I made lanterns, too."

She gazed up at the stars with a pensive smile.

"My name means 'weaver princess,' she said reflectively." The first time we had Tanabata, when I went to live with Juu-nii's family, Okaasama told me that my name was written with the same characters that the Star-hime's name was written with. I always loved the story after that."

She pinkened slightly.

"I had this silly idea as a kid that I might meet my Star Prince on Tanabata one year," she admitted sheepishly. "I've outgrown the idea now, but my sister Miyabi has a head for romantic stuff and she probably influenced me to think that way."

"Well, I'm fine about the writing of wishes, not to mention the eating of festival food, since I'm starving," Kayashima said honestly. "I'm not so much for the girly mush about romance though. Tanabata is a fun time, but the love story I can take or leave."

Izumi's features twisted into a derisive expression, and her fingers fluttered together, their actions staccato enough to give away her tone, even if not her words. Kayashima sent her a suspicious glance.

"What did you just say about me?"

Izumi offered him an innocent smile, shrugging her shoulders, and Ketsui laughed.

"You should be able to tell by the expression on her face that whatever it was probably wasn't repeatable in polite society," he teased. "Give it up, Kayashima. You won't win. Trust me."

Izumi poked her tongue out, and Ketsui offered her a smile.

“You know I’m right,” he told her. “I might only know how to read some of your signs, but I know when you’re ripping someone else to shreds, and when it’s not worth trying to come up with a response.”

“Izumi-chan just said that Kayashima wouldn’t know romance if it jumped up and bit his behind,” Kohaku observed pensively, his gaze drifting to the long woven streamers wound around the branches of the bamboo, wound into which he could now make out the tiny knots of paper that marked wishes already attached by the local people. “You said something about wishes, Ketsui-san? Can we write wishes? How does it work? I don’t know anything about this story — it wasn’t in the book that Kirio-san found for me about legends.”

“It’s a love story,” Kayashima pulled a graphic face, then, “hey, wait a minute? Koku, did you just read Ichimaru-san’s finger-symbols?”

“Mm?” Kohaku was only half listening, and Kayashima jabbed a well aimed elbow towards his ribs, causing him to yelp and round on his friend indignantly. “Hey! What was that for?!”

“You not listening. Going off into your own world is a bad habit of yours and tonight it’s strictly forbidden, especially when I asked you a question,” Kayashima was unrepentant. “Now answer it. Did you read Ichimaru-san’s sign-language?”

“Probably. So?” Kohaku cast his friend a confused look. “What about it? Izumi-chan speaks that way. I have extra classes with her with Taichou all the time lately, because we have to meet the Council’s criteria in order to stay in the Division as proper members. We both know different things so we’re helping each other — how on earth would we study together if I couldn’t speak her language?”

Izumi’s fingers fluttered again, her eyes rolling skywards, and Kohaku grinned, shrugging.

“I guess he doesn’t,” he agreed cryptically. “I didn’t think it was a big deal, but maybe it is.”

“You can understand Izumi’s signs?” Ketsui cast Kohaku a startled look. “How did you learn them so quickly?”

“I don’t suppose I really know,” Kohaku pursed his lips. “I don’t think I did learn them exactly. I think it was just... I knew how to read them. It’s hard to explain, Ketsui-san. But when I saw Joumei-dono attacked in the caves, I saw the attack through his eyes for a bit. And when I saw Izumi-chan when she was in danger at Thirteenth, I saw that through her eyes. I think when I did that, I also got pieces of their knowledge, too. Sometimes it happens like that. I learn things I never got taught how to do, because I confuse my mental boundaries with other people's when my reiryoku is heightened and I'm having a vision."

He shrugged.

"Yamamoto-sensei said when he came to meet me that the reidoku Father drank probably made my spirit power too sensitive, so I pick up on changes in reishi too easily. He thought that was why I had visions, because Kyouka amplifies that ability — so when I pick up those signals, I also pick up other unnecessary things that, if my control was better, I ought to be able to filter out. It's why sometimes people get affected by my mood, too — I can't control properly yet where I put my reiryoku and what I'm reading from other people's."

He grinned at Izumi, who offered him a smile in return.

"In this respect, though, it's an unexpected bonus," he added. "I guess there have to be some of those, given all the drawbacks of having power like this."

His expression became sheepish at Ketsui's incredulous look. "Father told me it was how I learned to read and write. I don't remember doing either, but when I was given the books Father found for me, I could read them just fine. I think I picked that up from seeing things through other people's eyes, too."

"Now that's a useful skill," Kirio observed, and Kohaku shrugged.

"Izumi-chan and I see a lot of each other," he said philosophically. "If I can understand her, it makes it easier. Besides, we're friends. Aren't we?" This last with a note of doubt, as he glanced at the young Kitsune, and the silver-haired recruit nodded her head. Her fingers danced and Kohaku grinned, relieved at the reassurance in her words.

"Well, at least it means there's someone in the Gotei who speaks Ichimaru-san's language," Shikiki remarked.

"Shikiki's right," Kirio nodded. "Don't look so starstruck, Ketsui — maybe Koku'll teach you, in return for all the sword drill you've been doing with him lately."

"He's better at that than I expected him to be," Ketsui acknowledged, casting his friend a rueful smile. "His shunpo sucks — he's the first shinigami I've ever known to headbutt a gatepost he's not supposed to be anywhere near when trying to step — and he hits like a girl — no offence to the girls present, of course! But his sword skills aren't as basic as I thought they were. I'm just wondering whose thoughts he might have picked that up from... and whether his improvement in that skill area had anything to do with seeing Minaichi-taichou fight Sakanoue and Kusakawa in the chimera he made us see the day Keitarou attacked.”

“Maybe,” Kohaku pursed his lips, and Kirio frowned, reaching over to cuff Ketsui with a warning glare.

“Stop downing the mood. We’re here for the matsuri, not to dig up bad memories,” she warned. “Besides, didn’t you say Magaki-san was going to meet us here? We ought to go find her — else she’ll think we got lost along the way.”

“Eighth have been pretty busy lately, because of Sora-dono going to Ninth and Shindou-san getting promoted,” Ketsui pointed out. “Shizu said she’d probably be a little late, otherwise we might as well have waited for her. But if we stand out here we’ll miss the festival. Koku wanted to write wishes, and we should all do that. Soul Society is at peace again — and so it’s a good time to think of what we want for the future.”

“I’d just like to not see any more future,” Kohaku murmured. “But I want to know what the story is. Will you tell me, Kirio-san? I don’t mind if it’s a love story. I just want to understand what all of this is for.”

“It’s the story of two stars who cross the sky once a year to meet over what’s known as the River of Heaven,” Kirio explained. “The Star Princess was the daughter of the Sky King, and she was lonely, so he arranged for her to marry the Herder Star. Only they fell so much in love they weren’t doing the duties they ought to do, so he separated them and broke their hearts. In the end he relented and allowed them to meet once a year, across the River of Heaven, and that festival is Tanabata.”

“I told you. Mushy girly romance stuff,” Kayashima said disparagingly.

“And the wishes?” Kohaku pressed.

“Traditionally girls wished to be better weavers, and men wished to be better at calligraphy, but I guess these days people wish for all kinds of things,” Shikiki remarked. “Things to make the world better. Things for their own happiness. Any kind of things. It doesn’t matter what.”

“I see,” Kohaku’s expression became thoughtful, but before he could make any further remark, there was a loud yell of “Ketsui!”, followed by a woosh of reiatsu as someone dropped out of an excited flashstep less than a foot away from where he stood. He jumped, almost falling headlong, and as he hurriedly steadied himself, he realised that the missing member of their party had finally arrived.

“I finally got away!” Shizuka’s eyes were glittering with anticipation. ‘I didn’t think I would, but Tetsuya-dono let me off early, since I said I was going to the matsuri. I’m meant to be sweeping out the training hall — again,’ she paused to roll her eyes, “but Taichou’s gone to Thirteenth for the evening and Tetsuya-dono said he didn’t mind if I slipped out. So here I am. I didn’t miss anything, did I?”

“We were just going to head into the village. Kohaku wanted to write wishes,” Ketsui told his friend, amused. “You almost cannoned right into him, Shizu — you should know that Kohaku can’t shunpo to save his life. Literally, if you come at him like that... he’s not a natural at dodging.”

“Rubbish. I was in complete control,” Shizuka snorted, then turned to offer Kohaku a grin. “Well, Koku? What do you want to wish for?”

Kohaku, who had been startled by her sudden appearance, recovered himself, returning the smile with a shrug of his own.

“I don’t know,” he said pensively. “I mean, there are a lot of things I could wish for. Father being reborn into a life where he doesn’t have to suffer any more. Katsu-nii finding a safe place and not ever clashing with the shinigami again. Mother being at peace with everything. Lots of things. But... I don’t know that I’ll wish for any of those things, when it comes down to it. They’re things I want, but I don’t know if they’re things I ought to wish for.”

“Why not?” Shikiki cast Kohaku a startled look. “They seem like good wishes to me, Koku-kun. And your father needs that new beginning — more than anyone, I think I understand how you feel about that.”

“Mm,” Kohaku nodded. “I know, and I’m glad you knew the other side of him too, Shikiki-san. It makes me feel better about everything he did do to people. But...”

He paused, gazing up at the sky and taking in the glittering specks that covered the heavens.

“The world is so big. I never realised how big till now, and I’m not the only person who’s lost people he loves, lately,” he murmured. “I can’t just wish for my family, not when there might be other families suffering just as much tragedy. I’m lucky. There’s nothing that I need in my own life, now. I found a place where I'm myself, and nobody's afraid of me. True, they steal my tabi and tie my hair to the bed when I oversleep, but I sort of enjoy that part of it. It makes me feel like I belong in Thirteenth. In Rukongai I was always separate. A secret. Hidden... either literally, or figuratively. Nobody there could ever call me Kohaku — but now they do, and I'm starting to like hearing it. It's not a demon's name — it's my name, and it's a nice one. It has a nice meaning, and I'm growing to like it."

"Kayashima, what do you guys do to the poor lad in the recruit dorm?" Kirio tut-tutted, and Kayashima grinned unrepentantly.

"New recruit initiation," he said innocently. "It's like Koku said. All about making him belong. Besides, he's only telling you half the story. I bet nobody told you that the reason Furuta showed up late to patrol yesterday and squelched his way through drill was because Koku threw his sandals in the koi pond."

"I did not!" Kohaku reacted indignantly, and Kayashima put his hands on his hips.

"Oh, so you didn't try and throw them the length of Ugendou and they didn't wind up sunk in the reeds? My mistake!"

"I was trying to get them all the way over! And you challenged me! You said they were your sandals! I didn't know they were Furuta's till later!"

"...I think I don't want to hear any more of this," Kirio exchanged wry looks with Ketsui, who shrugged philosophically.

"Recruits will be recruits," he said reflectively. "In any case, Kohaku, you were talking about your wishes."

"Oh. Yes," Kohaku reddened slightly, looking sheepish, but he nodded. "I just meant that I never knew anything about being a shinigami but now I do, I know that this is a place I ought to be. I could've ended up alone and with nothing, but I didn't. So wishing for something else for me seems selfish. Even if it's for my family. My family hurt a lot of people. It seems unfair to wish for them."

"I think that even if you don't make those wishes, Koku, they'll probably come true," Shikiki said thoughtfully. "Keitarou's soul will be reborn. It wasn't damaged or mutilated, so it will be, one day, in a completely different time and place from here. Juu-nii told me that there's no sign of your brother anywhere, so patrols to find him have been scaled back... Taichou hasn't made any attempt to pursue justice, and I almost wonder if she feels as though it's for Katsura-san to find a way to make amends for the things he did, rather than be killed for them. As for Eiraki-hime, she's back in District Seven now, isn't she? Her family took her home... and even if she's not herself, she's not in pain. People there still love her, despite what she did. She isn't alone."

"The world has to heal and move on, that's what you're saying, isn't it?" Shizuka's expression became grave. "I'm going to make my wish for Taichou. He's been better, lately, but I know he's still hurting a lot over this too. He hasn't come to see you yet, has he, Koku?" this last to the young stray, who shook his head.

"I asked Ukitake-dono if I should go see him," he admitted, "and he said I should wait. He said that Kyouraku-dono was a very sensitive person who didn't talk much about the things that bothered him the most. I'm sure I'm one of those things, so I'm trying not to be a bother to him. It's a shame because I'd like to talk to him more about the Kyouraku. Kyouka said my spirit power comes from that and Yamamoto-sensei said so too. He said that, probably, there are records relating to past Kyouka swords in the Kyouraku archive, but... I don't know how to broach that divide at the moment. We both did the things we had to do, and I'm not cross with him — but I don't want him to be upset because of something I've done or said."

"I could ask him for you," Shizuka suggested. "And like I said, I'm going to wish for him to be his old self again. Then I'm sure he'll come and see you, and you can talk. You are sort of family... in a really distant way."

"I have a lot of family I didn't know I had, but most of it is at arm's length and it's probably better that way," Kohaku observed. "The Endou, the Urahara... I don't blame them for wanting to keep their distance from me."

"Well, not this Urahara — and not Izumi, either," Ketsui said with a grin, and Izumi nodded, twitching her fingers in agreement. "Remember, our fathers were cousins, so we're on the same side. And you helped Izumi's brother, and mine, so you can count on us as family."

"Thirteenth are a family anyway," Kirio said comfortably. "Koku's just become a part of it, that's all."

"What about Magaki-san and I?" Shikiki objected playfully, and Kirio grinned.

"Honorary members," she responded. "but it makes me realise what I'm going to wish for. I'm going to wish that this family never gets ripped apart the way so many of our families have been before.”

“Well, if we don’t wish soon, we’ll miss our chance,” Shizuka pointed out, linking her arm in Kohaku’s and pulling him forward. “Come on. You can’t shunpo, so I’ll take you. Everyone, follow us. Last one at the village square buys dango for the rest!”

And with that Kohaku felt himself pulled into a dizzy shunpo step, finding himself deposited in the dusty centre of the village square before he could draw breath. At the sight of his dazed expression, Shizuka chuckled, hauling him to his feet.

“You’re still not convinced about moving at that speed, are you?” she observed, as he dusted himself down, and he raised his gaze ruefully to hers, shaking his head.

“I’ve never done it, and I don’t have good control yet,” he agreed. “I understand the theory, but I think it will be some time before I can shunpo properly.”

“Well, you have that. Time, I mean,” Shizuka said pensively. “And Taichou will come round, Koku. He will. I know he wants to rebuild that bridge, because he knows that you’re close to Juushirou-dono and I can tell that he wants to help you settle here, too. It’s just going to take a little while — and in the meantime, I’m here to bridge the gap.”

She dimpled, and the sombre expression was gone from her eyes.

“For now, we have wishes to write,” she continued, grabbing him by the arm and pulling him towards a gathering of village people. As they approached, Kohaku was aware of Ketsui and Kirio, followed by the others entering the square, and he returned the smile with a wistful one of his own, nodding his head.

“I feel guilty, but I’m happy,” he observed. “It’s a sensation I’m not used to feeling, and I don’t know if I have the right to feel it with all that’s gone on — but I am happy. Do you think it’s wrong, for me to feel that way?”

“I don’t think it’s ever wrong to be happy,” Shizuka looked startled, then she shook her head. “You have a right to have your life, Koku. Just because people locked you up and treated you like a monster, it doesn’t mean they were right. We know you’re not one, and you’re an adult now. All adults have the right to choose their own lives. Riri-nee wasn’t happy about me being a shinigami, but she let me because she said it was up to me to be whatever I wanted to be. You want to be here, with Kirio-san and Ketsui and the others, so that’s what you should do. Being happy is important, and hard to grasp hold of — it’s easy to lose, so you shouldn't feel guilty for it. If your family really loved you, they'd want that for you anyway. So be happy. It's not wrong. Especially on a night like tonight."

Kohaku opened his mouth to reply, but before the words left his lips, something faint brushed against his senses, and he paused, brow furrowing as he turned his head towards the dark shadows of the woodland beyond.

Katsu-nii?

"Koku?" Kayashima descended upon them at that moment, giving him a playful shove and almost knocking him off his feet. "Hey, I thought I already told you! No going off into your own world!"

"Kayashima!" Kohaku steadied himself, glaring at his friend, but the sensation that had been there moments before was gone and he let out a rueful sigh, knowing that it had more likely never been there at all.

Wishful thinking, maybe. Perhaps its selfish, but I will include you in my wishes, Katsu-nii. I'll wish that you find a life that makes you happy, like I have. And, even if we don't ever meet again, that you're safe. That's what Mother would want for you — and I want it, too.

"Thank you, little brother. And to you, too,"

For a moment, Kohaku thought he heard his brother's voice, but it was just the howl of the wind, and he took a deep breath, pushing the thoughts away.

The past is gone. The future is an open book. I'm going to write in that book, somehow, and do something important with this life. I'm going to make people happy, Katsu-nii. I'm going to help them live, and I'm going to make them happy. I'm going to use Kyouka in whatever way I can to make this world better for everyone... from now until the moment that I die. That's my wish. That I get to do that... somehow.

Out loud he said,

"I'm sorry. I'm fine. I've decided on my wish... so lets go."

"I'm going to make people happy, Katsu-nii."

From the recesses of the dark woodland beyond, Katsura pulled his body more tightly into the darkened branches, a sad smile touching his lips as Kohaku's words rippled across his thoughts once more. He had sworn to himself to keep away, but that night, he had sensed his brother's reiryoku and he had not been able to resist seeing for himself that Kohaku was safe.

What he had seen had both reassured him and torn him in two, though it had not surprised him. Since the day Mitsuki had healed him, he had seen it more and more clearly in his mind's eye, images picked up from Kohaku's latent subconscious that, he knew now, the young man himself had not even been aware of. A subconscious part of him had always suspected Kohaku would become a shinigami, but he had just pushed the thought away and tried not to credit it, safe and sure in the belief that his brother could not possibly want such a connection. Now, though, he had seen it with his own eyes and he had heard his brother's resolve. He had not meant to connect to Kohaku's mind, but it had happened anyway, and as that resolution had tricked over their connection, Katsura had known that everything had changed.

His heart ached.

Well, little brother. You really don't need me to protect you any more. You're trying to protect me, instead, and everyone else, too. I wonder what Father would make of the you I saw today... probably he'd be disappointed. I'm not, though. Knowing we're going separate ways doesn't change the fact we're brothers. And besides, I believe you. Maybe you will make people happy. More, maybe you can be happy... even with the shinigami. If that's the case, I wouldn't ever interfere.

He closed his eyes, drawing a fleeting image into the forefront of his mind. It was hazy and translucent to begin with, but as he focused on it more and more, he could see the outlines of a young man robed in black and white, the heavy folds of a white haori fluttering around his shoulders. Across the back of the haori were the four slashes that made up the character for five, and as the man turned to face him, Katsura met the resolve deep in his brother's brown eyes. For a moment he held the gaze of this future illusion, and then, the next instant, it was gone.

He opened his eyes once more, gazing up at the stars.

I've seen your future, even if you haven't yet. You left it with me, and it means that, even when we're far apart, I'll know how you're growing and getting on. That's enough for me, I guess. Like the girl said, being happy is rare and important. You should take every chance you have to be that, Koku-kun. Whether we're there to see it or not, the people of Rukongai and Seireitei are in safe hands now you're learning how to protect them. That's a dream I can believe in too — so even from the shadows, I'll do all I can from this point on to help your wish come true.

Author's Note: The End Is Nigh ;)

So that's it, people. Sukuse is complete. Thank you all for coming along on this journey with Team Stupid and I — it was a story I wanted to write and at so many points I thought it would never get finished but you guys kept me going and so it did. I hope you think it was worthwhile reading along!

Obviously there are matters left unsettled. I'm sure some people will have at least guessed at the significance of Hiko and why he was included in the plot. Obviously it was already indicated that Hiko is Kirio's missing brother, but there's a reason I never gave their surname... I wanted to see if people could guess what was going on because I'm horrible and evil like that. If you're not sure, just bear in mind these two things — who it is that's looking for him, and the fact Hiko has red hair...

This epilogue also ties up the final loose end where Mareiko is concerned. When she was talking to Keitarou, she told him that they weren't kin. Obviously, that wasn't true — but until this point, she didn't know it. As far as she was concerned, she always grew up illegitimate and with no proper blood connection to the Urahara. Thus in her eyes, she wasn't related to him in any way. I wasn't sure whether to include this part, but realised that explaining Shougo and Daigo's real reason for taking in Mareiko needed to be clarified. For Mareiko's part, I've said before that I imagined her being one of the forerunners of creating the Kidou Corps.

Like I said earlier in the story, the antagonists in Sukuse were loosely based around the themes of the Espada. Very loosely in the case of Shougo. But a lot of people asked me when I was writing Third Chronicle and Fourth Maki, "why did Seireitei trust Sousuke, if Keitarou was such a threat?" Kohaku is the answer. People who've read Mirror, Flower, Water, Moon will already have known that connection, but he is the reason the Aizen name was restored.

As for Koku himself, people have also asked me who it is he marries. The answer is in this epilogue really ;)

As for me, I am still smitten with Bleach and its characters, even though the manga lately is making me frustrated. I think I've exhausted the Juu and Shun story ideas for the time being, though... I don't know what I might write next, if anything. I guess watch this space...

Once again, thank you for coming along with me on this ride. Though it hasn't quite been a Meifu tale, I hope that it's been enjoyable nonetheless. I never expected to be writing about Juu and Shun this long and I'm certain it's because you guys were supporting me that I did. I hope that my writing has improved from the exercise, because my love of Juu and Shun certainly has!